

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. # THE SOUTHEASTERN REPORTER VOLUME 72

(156 N. C. 1)

SWINDELL et al. v. SMAW.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 13, 1911.)

1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 23*)—POSSESSION OF PLAINTIFF—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

An action to quiet title brought under Revisal 1906, § 1589, may be brought by a plaintiff who is not in possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 55, 56; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

2. WILLS (§ 614*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES DEVEISED—LIFE ESTATE OR FEE—"HEIRS."

Testatrix gave to her husband "all my possessions, land, stock, farming implements, household and kitchen furniture, him all I have, his life time (if I leave know heirs)," with the request that, if testatrix left no heirs, he would give all to persons named. Held, that the word "heirs" was to be construed as meaning "children," and that it was the intention of testatrix that the property should go to her husband for life, then to her children, should she leave any at her death, and then over to the persons named.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1393-1416; Dec. Dig. § 614.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3241-3265; vol. 8, pp. 7677-7678.]

3. QUIETING TITLE (§ 30*)—PARTIES—REMAINDERMEN—HEIRS AND NEXT OF KIN.

In an action to quiet title brought by heirs at law of a testatrix against her surviving husband in possession of the property, as tenant for life with remainder over, the remaindermen should be made parties and also the other heirs and the next of kin of the testatrix.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 64-66; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by George L. Swindell and others against S. V. Smaw. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ward & Grimes, for appellant. Nicholson & Daniel, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. Mollie F. Smaw died, leaving as her last will and testament the following paper writing: "I, Mollie S. Smaw, while in good health and right mind, give unto my husband, Samuel V. Smaw, all my possessions, land, stock, farming implements, household and kitchen furniture him all I have, his life time (if I leave know heirs) he must pay all my debts, if any, I leave him executor to my will. I will make a request of him if I leave know heirs. I would like for him to give all to Earnest and Myrtle Swindell, Myrtle S.—my organ and watch and chain after his death. This is my only and last will as have settled all my father's debts and payed all the heirs I feel as I can do as I choose with what little I have. Signed this day, June 21st, 1899. Mollie S. Smaw. [Seal.] [Duly witnessed.]"

[1] This action is brought by certain of the heirs at law of the deceased against her husband who is in possession of the property to remove a cloud upon title under Revisal, § 1589, alleging that he is claiming the same in fee simple, whereas the alleged will is void for uncertainty, and the defendant is entitled only to a life estate as tenant by the curtesy, or, at most, under the will he has a life estate only. Such action can now be brought, though the plaintiff is not in possession. Daniels v. Baxter, 120 N. C. 14, 26 S. E. 635; McLean v. Shaw, 125 N. C. 492, 34 S. E. 634.

[2] The will is very inartificially drawn, but we do not think it is so unmeaning as to be void. The devise to the husband is specifically for "his life time," and there is nothing in the will to extend it beyond that time. The request that, if she should leave no heirs, she wishes him to give all to Earnest and Myrtle Swindell, does not show that she intended for him to have more than a life estate, but the contrary. It is badly expressed, but the meaning is that they are to have all her property after her husband's death if she should die leaving no heirs. By the word "heirs" she evidently meant "children," which is not an unusual use of the word among those who do not know its technical meaning in the law. The testatrix intended by this will, as we understand it, that the property should go to her husband for life, then to her children should she leave any at her death, and, if none, then over to Earnest and Myrtle Swindell, with a special provision that Myrtle should have her organ and watch and chain.

In Hauser v. Craft, 134 N. C. 319, 46 S. E. 756, as to an item in a will very similar to this, where there was a devise of property to A. for life, and, should A. die without leaving children, then over to the testator's heirs, the court held that A. held a life estate with a remainder to the children. This has been cited and approved in Wilkinson v. Boyd, 136 N. C. 47, 48 S. E. 516; Anderson v. Wilkins, 142 N. C. 161, 55 S. E. 272, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1145; Cox v. Jernigan, 154 N. C. 584, 70 S. E. 949.

[3] Earnest and Myrtle Swindell should have been made parties to this proceeding. But, as the decision is in their favor, we do not hold the case up till they are made parties. When the case goes back for final judgment below, upon the facts agreed, it will be well to have them made parties, also any other heirs and next of kin of the testatrix, if any, who are not already parties to this action.

Reversed.

ELLIS v. TRUSTEES OF GRADED SCHOOL OF OXFORD.

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 90*)—AUTHORITY TO CREATE.

While the Legislature may create special public quasi corporations such as graded school districts and give them power to contract debts, levy taxes, etc., the constitutional restrictions as to municipal indebtedness and as to exercise of the powers granted must be observed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—INDEBTEDNESS—CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS—"NECESSARY EXPENSE"—"MUNICIPAL CORPORATION."

Graded school districts are public quasi corporations within the term "municipal corporation," as used in Const. art. 7, § 7, prohibiting any city, town, or other municipal corporation from contracting debts except for necessary expenses, unless by vote of the qualified voters; so that a graded school district could not issue bonds to erect a school building unless their issue was approved by a majority of the qualified voters; the erection of a school building not being a "necessary expense" within section 7.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4620-4627; vol. 8, p. 7726; vol. 5, pp. 4715-4716.]

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 108*)—MUNICIPAL INDEBTEDNESS—PAYMENT—TAXATION.

The payment of bonds issued by a graded school district of a town for erecting a school building may be enforced by appropriate taxation, whether they expressly provide for that means of payment or not, and irrespective of whether they are secured by a mortgage on the school building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Granville County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Suit by S. V. Ellis against the Trustees of the Graded School of Oxford, N. C. From a judgment dissolving a temporary injunction restraining the issuance and sale of bonds, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Defendants, the Trustees of the Graded School of the Town of Oxford, N. C., Incorporated, having determined to issue bonds to the amount of $20,000 as a debt of said Graded School District, Incorporated, and having advertised same for sale, the plaintiff, a citizen and taxpayer of the town, instituted the present action to restrain the said bond issue, claiming that said proposed action was unlawful because the proposition had not been approved by the vote of the people. The court, being of opinion that the board on the facts presented had the power to issue and sell the bonds, gave judgment that the preliminary restraining order be dissolved, and that the trustees be allowed to proceed, whereupon plaintiff excepted and appealed to the Supreme Court.

Graham & Devin, for appellees.

HOKE, J. On the hearing it was made to appear that the General Assembly by chapter 333, Laws 1903, had incorporated the graded school district of the town of Oxford, conferring upon the board of trustees the power of general supervision and control of school matters within said district, and among other things making provision as follows: "The said Board of Graded School Trustees hereby created shall be a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of the Board of Graded School Trustees of the Town of Oxford, and by that name shall be capable of receiving gifts and grants, purchasing and holding real and personal property, selling, mortgaging and transferring the same for school purposes, and of prosecuting and defending suits for or against the corporation hereby created. Conveyances to said board shall be to it and its successors in office, and all deeds, mortgages and other agreements affecting real estate and personal property shall be deemed sufficiently executed when signed by the chairman of said Board of Graded School Trustees and attested by the secretary." Section 6. The act conferring power also to levy a tax not exceeding 30 cents on the hundred dollars valuation of property and 90 cents on the polls for the support of the graded schools of the district had been duly submitted and approved by a vote of the people of the district as directed by the statute itself, and in accord with constitutional requirement. In the case agreed the facts pertinent to the inquiry are further stated as follows: (4) "That by chapter 108, Pr. Laws 1911, legislative authority was granted to defendant board to issue bonds for the erection of a graded school building in said town for school purposes, said act of 1911 setting out the manner thereof, with authority to execute deed of trust on said property to secure same. This act of 1911 does not provide for any tax levy in addition to that provided by the act of 1903. * * * It is agreed that the act of 1911 may be read in full as if inserted here. * * * (5) That no election was provided or held under said act of 1911. (6) That the defendant board has advertised for sale, and is now offering for sale, $20,000 in bonds executed by said board, and, unless restrained, will issue said bonds as the obligation of said board." On these facts the court is of opinion that the bonds in question would not be valid obligations of the school district, and that their issue in the form as now proposed should be permanently enjoined.

[1] While it is now well established with us that the "Legislature may create special public quasi corporations for governmental purposes in designated portions of the state territory," and "confer upon them power to contract debts, levy taxes," etc. (Trustees of Youngsville Township v. Webb, 155 N. C. 379, 71 S. E. 520), it is also as fully recognized that, when in the exercise of such power a given district has been created, the restrictions and limitations provided by the Constitution in reference to municipal indebtedness and as to the methods and powers of taxation of such corporations must be observed (Smith v. School Trustees, 141 N. C. 143, 53 S. E. 524). In article 7, § 7, Const., this being the section more directly relevant to this inquiry, it is provided "that no county, city, town or other municipal corporation shall contract any debt, pledge its faith or loan its credit, nor shall any tax be levied or contracted by any officers of the same, except for the necessary expenses thereof unless by a vote of the majority of the qualified voters therein."

[2] And the doctrine as above stated in reference to this and other restrictive provisions of the Constitution which are applicable will be found very well stated in the third and fourth headnotes of Smith v. School Trustees, supra, as follows: "(3) The Legislature can create a specific school district within the precincts of a county, incorporate its controlling authorities, confer upon them certain governmental powers, and, when accepted and sanctioned by a vote of the qualified electors within the prescribed territory as required by our Constitution (article 7, § 7), may delegate to such authorities power to levy a tax and issue bonds in furtherance of the corporate purpose. (4) School districts are public quasi corporations, included in the term 'municipal corporations' as used in article 7, § 7, of our Constitution, and so come within the express provisions of section 7, that 'no county, city, town or other municipal corporation shall contract any debt, pledge its faith, or loan its credit, etc.; nor shall any tax be levied, etc., unless by a vote of the majority of the qualified voters therein.' And the principle of uniformity is established and required by section 9 of this article."

Again, in Hollowell v. Borden, 148 N. C. 255, 61 S. E. 638, it was held: "(1) A legally qualified board of trustees of the graded schools of a town is a municipal corporation within the meaning and purport of article 7, § 7, of the State Constitution. (2) The expense of a public school system of a town is not a necessary municipal expense, and a bond issue to pay a debt contracted for that purpose, to be constitutional, must be submitted to a vote of the qualified voters of the township." The erection of this school building, therefore, not being a necessary expense within the meaning of the constitutional provision, it follows from these and other decisions of similar import that the proposed indebtedness could not be lawfully incurred "unless approved by a majority of the qualified voters of the school district." It is insisted for defendants that, although no election has been had and none provided for under the statute of 1911, the power was conferred by the former statute, to wit, chapter 333, Laws 1903, which was submitted to and approved by the voters, and this by virtue of that clause in the act by which trustees were authorized to "purchase and hold real and personal property and to sell, mortgage and transfer the same for school purposes," but the position in our opinion cannot be sustained. It may be that, if the proposition now presented was to issue these bonds, secure the same by a mortgage on the building, and with the stipulation that the owner could in no event hold the municipality for any sum greater than could be realized by foreclosure sale under the mortgage, the authority to mortgage contained in the act of 1903 would suffice; but such is not the proposition embodied in the case agreed. There is no allegation that this indebtedness shall be restricted to the proceeds of the mortgage. We do not find it stated that a mortgage is even intended.

[3] On the contrary, these bonds, to the amount of $20,000, whether secured by a mortgage on the building or not, are to constitute a valid municipal indebtedness, and, where this is true, it is very generally held that payment may be enforced by appropriate taxation, and this whether provision is expressly made for such taxation or not. City of Charlotte v. Shepard, 122 N. C. 602, 29 S. E. 842; 1 Abbott on Municipal Corporations, p. 360. In the last citation the general principle is expressed as follows: "Corporate indebtedness legally incurred for a public purpose by the corporation in its capacity as a public or governmental agent is generally paid through the imposition and collection of taxes, and, as will be noted in a succeeding section (310), the payment of a valid indebtedness is considered a public purpose, and one authorizing such action. In the absence of a constitutional or statutory limitation upon the power to tax, the granting of the authority to incur an indebtedness impliedly authorizes the levy of taxes sufficient to pay the debt and the interest as it becomes due (311). Though some few cases hold to the contrary, the weight of authority is sustained by the better reason." A statute conferring power to create a debt to be secured by mortgage on a specific piece of property in its ordinary management is a very different proposition from the power to contract for a large municipal indebtedness, enforceable by taxation on all the property in a given district. A voter might very well be disposed to approve the one, and be entirely opposed to the other. We are of opinion, therefore, that the proposed bond issue comes directly within the provisions of article 7, § 7, of the Constitution, that no vote of the people has been had thereon, and that the issue in the form as now proposed should be permanently enjoined.

There is error, and this will be certified that judgment shall be entered according to this opinion.

Reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County; Justice, Judge.

Action by H. V. Sutton against Hannah Lyons and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. New trial.

The plaintiff alleges that he was injured by the negligence of the defendant on the 7th of August, 1906, while working at her mill, and that the negligence consisted in a defect in the machinery. The defendant denies negligence, and also denies that she was the owner of the mill, or that she operated it. The defendant admits in her answer that the mill is located on her land, and that it was engaged in sawing some of the timber on the land, but that it has not been in operation for 12 months. The defendant further alleges that the plaintiff was a trespasser in going upon said premises, and that he was there contrary to the express orders and directions of the defendant. It was in evidence that W. J. Tate managed the mill, and, for the purpose of showing that he was agent of the defendant Lyon, the plaintiff offered in evidence the tax list of the plaintiff for the year 1906, signed "W. J. Tate, agent," which was excluded, and the plaintiff excepted. There was some evidence of negligence, and that this was the cause of the plaintiff's injury, but his honor, being of opinion that there was no evidence that the defendant Lyon was the owner of the mill and operated it, entered a judgment of nonsuit, on motion of the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

W. M. Bond and Ward & Grimes, for appellant. J. C. B. Ehringhaus and E. F. Aydlett, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] In our opinion there was evidence fit to be submitted to the jury. It is not conclusive in its nature, and may be weakened or strengthened, when all the facts are developed. The size of the mill, and whether easily moved from one place to another, would be material circumstances. The admission that she is the owner of the land on which the mill is located is some evidence that she is the owner of the mill.

[2] If affixed to the soil, it would be a part of the land, nothing else appearing, and, if not and it was personalty, the fact that it is on her land is evidence of possession, and evidence of the possession of personalty is evidence of title, in the absence of other proof. There is also evidence that the defendant was exercising dominion over the property, as she says she had given direction for the plaintiff to stay off the premises. The circumstance that the mill "is situated" on the land, and "has not been in operation during the past twelve months," is entitled to some weight, as ordinarily valuable property, not in use, is not left so long on the land of another.

[3] If there is evidence that the defendant is the owner of the mill on her land, and sawing her timber, this could be considered by the jury on the question of the operation of the mill. "Where the plaintiff has suffered an injury from the negligent management of a vehicle, such as a boat, car, or carriage, it is sufficient prima facie evidence that the negligence was imputable to the defendant to show that he was the owner of the thing, without proving affirmatively that the person in charge was the defendant's servant. It lies with the defendant to show that the person in charge was not his servant, leaving him to show, if he can, that the property was not under his control at the time, and that the accident was occasioned by the fault of a stranger, an independent contractor or other person, for whose negligence the owner would not be answerable. 1 Sherm. and Redf. Neg. 71. Any other rule, especially where persons are dealing with corporations which can act only through agents and servants, would render it almost impossible for a plaintiff to recover for injuries sustained by defective machinery or negligent use of machinery." Midgette v. Manufacturing Co., 150 N. C. 341, 64 S. E. 8.

[4] The abstract of taxes was not admissible in evidence. It was offered to show that Tate was the agent of the defendant, but it amounted to no more than a declaration, and an agency cannot be proved in this way. "That an agency must be proved aliunde the declarations of the alleged agent is elementary law, and this is true both as to the establishment of the agency, and the nature and extent of the authority." West v. Grocery Co., 138 N. C. 168, 50 S. E. 566.

[5] It may, however, be established by the testimony of the agent under oath. Machine Co. v. Seago, 128 N. C. 160, 38 S. E. 805.

The judgment of nonsuit is set aside, and a new trial ordered.

OWENS et ux. v. HORNTAL et al.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 85*)—STAY—ABSENCE OF MORTGAGEE FROM STATE.

While in ejectment the absence of the owner from the state does not suspend limitations where there is a tenant in possession against whom the action may be brought, ejectment being a possessory action, a suit to vacate a mortgage foreclosure sale for fraud is equitable, and the mortgagees making the sale, of whom an accounting for rents and profits is sought, are necessary parties, so that the absence of one of them from the state would stay limitations; Revisal 1905, § 391, subsec. 4, requiring an action for the redemption of a mortgage where the mortgagee has been in possession to be brought within 10 years, applying.

3. MORTGAGES (§ 529*)—SALE UNDER FORECLOSURE—ANNULING—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—FRAUD.

4. MORTGAGES (§ 529*)—SALE—VACATING—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a suit to set aside a mortgage foreclosure sale for fraud and for an accounting for rents and profits, deeds for timber sold from the land by the purchaser were admissible on the issue of accounting as tending to show the amount received for the timber.

5. MORTGAGES (§ 553*)—SALE—VACATING—RELIEF—ACCOUNTING.

If a mortgage foreclosure sale was void for fraud, the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee continued, and the mortgagee who purchased from the purported purchaser must account for money received from timber sold from the land after the attempted foreclosure, though the timber had at that time greatly increased in value.

7. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE OF ERROR.

In an action in which the burden was upon plaintiff to prove an issue, error in a charge that "the whole evidence of the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case" was not prejudicial where the court further charged that plaintiff's evidence was to go to the jury for what it was worth, and it, with the evidence of the defendant, is left with the jury, the burden of proving the issue being on the plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Ward, Judge.

Action by L. L. Owens and wife against L. H. Hornthal and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mrs. Caroline B. Hilliard was the owner of a half interest in the lands set out in complaint known as the "Polly Garrett lands." On February 13, 1885, Caroline B. Hilliard and her husband, J. P. Hilliard, executed a mortgage on said one-half interest to the defendant L. H. Hornthal and his copartner, L. Hornthal. The mortgage had the usual power of sale. L. H. Hornthal afterwards acquired the interest of his brother and comortgagee. After said mortgage was executed, the said Caroline B. Hilliard, the owner of the one-half interest, died, leaving four children, the feme plaintiff being one, and therefore the owner by descent of a one-eighth interest in said lands. On March 2, 1896, in default of payment, the mortgagees sold the land under the power contained in the mortgage at the courthouse, when L. P. Hornthal, son of L. H. and nephew of L. Hornthal, became the purchaser at $1,000, the mortgagees executing a deed to him dated March 2, 1896. By deed dated March 27, 1896, for a recited consideration of $1,000, L. P. Hornthal reconveyed the land to the two mortgagees, L. H. and L. Hornthal. The plaintiff brings this action to set aside the sale (claiming that it was fraudulent and void and that L. P. Hornthal purchased for the mortgagees), and for an accounting of rents and profits.

The court submitted these issues:

"(1) Does the defendant L. H. Hornthal hold one-eighth interest in the Polly Garrett tract of land mentioned in the pleadings as mortgagee for the plaintiff? Answer: Yes.

"(2) What is the amount now due on said one-eighth interest to the defendant on said mortgage? Answer: One-fourth of $3,182.14—$795.54.

"(3) What is the net aggregate rental on said one-eighth interest since March 2, 1896? Answer: $505.

"(4) What is one-eighth value of timber sold by said defendant from said land? Answer: $518.75.

"(5) Is said cause of action barred by the statute of limitation? Answer: No."

There was a motion for new trial, which was refused. From the judgment rendered, defendants appealed.

E. F. Aydlett, for appellants. W. M. Bond, W. M. Bond, Jr., and Ward & Grimes, for appellees.

BROWN, J. 1. It is contended by defendants that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations.

The undisputed evidence shows that on March 2, 1896, the date of the attempted foreclosure, the feme plaintiff, the owner of the one-eighth interest, was married and a minor, and continued under disability beyond 1898; that in 1897 or 1898 both mortgagees removed to Norfolk, and have never resided in this state since. The defendants' evidence establishes that the mortgagees and those claiming under them have been in possession of the lands since the sale March 2, 1896.

[1] It is supposed that the absence of the defendant Hornthal from the state does not prevent the running of the statute. It is true that in an action of ejectment, where there is a tenant or person in possession, against whom action may be brought, the absence of the true owner from the state does not suspend the running of the statute. McFarland v. Cornwell, 151 N. C. 423, 66 S. E. 454. That is because ejectment is a possessory action and may be maintained against the person in possession. But this proceeding is essentially equitable in its nature, and the mortgagees who made the sale and who are asked to account for rents and profits are necessary parties. It is governed by Revisal 1905, § 391, subsec. 4. The point is expressly ruled in McFarland v. Cornwell, supra.

2. It is contended that his honor erred in denying the motion to nonsuit because there is no evidence that the mortgagees purchased the land at their own sale through L. P. Hornthal.

[2] Although he is the son of one and the nephew of the other mortgagee, no presumption of fraud arises because of such relationship. There are cases which support such presumption when a deed for his property is made by one in failing circumstances to a near relative. Lee v. Pearce, 68 N. C. 76; Smith v. Moore, 149 N. C. 198, 62 S. E. 892.

But no such presumption arises because of the sole fact that a son of full age buys under a mortgage sale made by his father, the mortgagee. We do not understand his honor to have held to the contrary.

[3] But there is evidence in this record which justified his honor in submitting to the jury the question of the validity and bona fides of the sale of March 2, 1896. While in this case no presumption of fraud arises from it, near relationship to the mortgagees is a circumstance in evidence. It is not sufficient of itself to warrant a verdict, but in this case it is supported by other evidence of a pregnant character. The plaintiff's evidence tends to prove that L. P. Hornthal was insolvent and in debt; that he was a very young man, dependent on his father; that the consideration recited in the reconveyance made shortly after the sale was exactly the sum bid for the land; that there was no advertisement of the land, and that it was bid off by the son for a third or half of its actual value. It is true this evidence is controverted, but it is of such probative force that his honor was justified in submitting the issue to the jury.

[4] 3. The timber deeds from the Hornthals were competent evidence tending to show what they had received for timber sold off this land. So long as the statute does not bar it is immaterial that the timber was sold by Hornthal long after the attempted foreclosure.

[5] If that was a nullity, the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee continues, and Hornthal must account for whatever he received for the timber at the time he sold it. The fact that gum timber had increased immensely in value between 1896 and 1909 cannot change a well-settled rule of law. It is unfortunate for the defendant Hornthal that he did not proceed to foreclosure in a manner more impregnable than the method pursued.

[6, 7] 4. In concluding his charge, his Honor said to the jury "that the whole evidence of the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case to go to you for what it is worth, and it, with the evidence of the defendant, is left with you to say, the burden of proving the issue being on the plaintiff, to say how you will answer the issue. It is evidence from which you may or may not answer the issue 'Yes.'" We think his honor was inadvertent in using the words "prima facie case," and, if he had gone no further, we would be compelled to award a new trial. But the remainder of the sentence, as well as the entire preceding charge, indicates clearly that the burden of establishing the issue was placed on the plaintiff where it properly belonged. While the use of the words "prima facie case" was erroneous, it was evidently an inadvertence, which, taking the charge as a whole, could not have misled the jury.

We have considered the remaining assignments of error, and find them to be without merit.

No error.

4. TRESPASS (§ 82*)—CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY—"FORCIBLE TRESPASS"—DEFINITION.

"Forcible trespass" is the entering upon land in another's actual possession with such force or violence as is calculated to intimidate or alarm the possessor or tending to breach the peace; the amount of force necessary being such as to raise a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the possessor that he must give way to avoid a breach of the peace.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

T. S. Davenport and others were convicted of forcible trespass, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Aycock & Winston, Ward & Grimes, and Chas. Whedbee, for appellants. Attorney General Bickett and G. L. Jones, for the State.

WALKER, J. The defendant Davenport and 17 others were indicted and convicted in the court below of forcible trespass in tearing down three shacks, which had been erected in a lumber or logging camp, and which were each about 10 feet long and 7 feet wide, made of poles and covered with tar paper, and had been built upon the land two or three days before the alleged trespass. The defendants have appealed to this court, and now allege that the learned judge who presided at the trial committed 34 errors in his several rulings during the hearing of the cause.

The case had its origin in a dispute between the Roper Lumber Company and the Richmond Cedar Works over the title to a certain tract of land lying in that portion of the Dismal Swamp known as the "Allen Swamp," which has as its northern boundary the dividing line between this state and Virginia, along which there is a canal running east and west with the said line. A careful perusal of the evidence taken in the case convinces us that the prosecutor, representing the Roper Lumber Company, and the defendants, representing the Richmond Cedar Works, were at the time of the alleged trespass vying with each other in an effort to gain the actual possession of the premises, in order to gain some advantage in defending the title to the land. The Roper Lumber Company, by its servants and agents, had actual possession of the land known as Allen Swamp at the place where the huts had been constructed. The defendants, representing the Richmond Cedar Works, entered upon this part of Allen Swamp while the prosecutor was in actual and peaceable possession thereof, and ordered its servants and agents, who were then in charge of the same, to quit the premises. There were about 40 members of the invading force, some of whom carried axes and others guns, and, when compliance with their demand was refused, they proceeded to demolish the huts and then to burn them. There was no physical resistance made by those in actual possession of the locus in quo, who held the possession until the cabins began to fall, and then abandoned the premises to the defendants. An extract from the testimony of the principal defendant, T. S. Davenport, will suffice to show the essential facts of the case, upon which our conclusion as to the law will be based: "Ours (camps) were built eight days before the Roper Company's. The camps of the Richmond Cedar Works had been occupied all the time during those eight days and all full of men. I think there was close between 30 and 40 men who had stayed in those camps in the Allen Swamp—the camps of the Richmond Cedar Works. These camps were all close as a half a mile to the ones the Roper Company put up. When I found they were there, I took my men and went there. First went to Hawks' camp, and said, 'Hawks, I have come here to take possession of this camp. The Richmond Cedar Works sent me here to hold possession of these woods, and I am going to take possession of this camp and cut it down and burn it.' He says: 'My things are all in there.' And I said: 'I will take care of the things; get them out.' And he and Sanders got them out. They came out of the camp, and I cut the camp down and threw it on the fire. That was the end of that camp. Then I took my men and went out on down the ditch where they had just built three camps down there. That was on Wednesday. We went on to the Mathias camp. They were all standing outside of the camp, and I said, 'Mr. Mathias, are you in charge of these woods now?' He said, 'Yes.' I said, 'I am going to take possession of the camps, cut them down, and burn them up.' I told him my reason, that the Cedar Works sent me there to hold possession, and I was going to do it. He is the only man I parted my lips to. I then told him I was going to cut the camps up. He said, 'You may cut the others down, but you won't cut this one down.' I said, 'This is the best looking camp. This is the one I am going to take first.' He says: 'I'll be damned if you cut this one down.' I said: 'Boys, fall in on this camp.' Before that he leaves his door and goes back in the camp, and, as they had then commenced to tear the roof up, he said, 'Let me get my bed and things out, and then I will get out.' I said, 'All right.' Then I said, 'Boys, get in there and help him get his bed out and other things.' He had some peas on the fire, and I had the boys take those out, and I told them to take all out and take his bed and lay it out there somewhere, and then go ahead and cut the camp down."

The contention of the defendants seems to be that they should have been allowed to show that they had constructive possession of the place where the trespass is alleged to have been committed by reason of the fact that they were in actual occupation of the remainder of Allen Swamp; that the prosecutor, by its servants and agents, had unlawfully entered upon the land, which was the property of the Richmond Cedar Works, and had wrongfully withheld the same, and that, when they demanded possession of the land, they were merely asserting the right and title of the Richmond Cedar Works to the same, and had no unfriendly feeling toward the parties in possession, and did not intend to injure them.

Before entering upon a discussion of the main question involved in the case, we will refer to one technical objection made during the course of the trial by the defendants. When the solicitor had read the three indictments, the defendants moved that he be required to elect upon which count in each of the bills he would rely. The court overruled this motion, and held that it would not require the election until the evidence had been heard. The motion was not renewed at the close of the evidence. It appears that the solicitor abandoned all the charges except the one for forcible trespass, and did not prosecute for malicious injury to property, and the judge so stated in the charge to the jury.

[1] It cannot be doubted now that the solicitor was not put to his election until the close of the evidence, or at least that the judge was not required to restrict the trial to any special count until he could intelligently do so by knowing what the evidence in the case would be. This was decided in State v. Parish, 104 N. C. 679, 10 S. E. 457, where it was said: "This court has repeatedly held that the presiding judge may in his discretion hear the evidence on a number of counts in a single indictment charging felony, or 'on a number of distinct bills, treating each as a count of the same bill,' and refuse to require the solicitor to elect till the close of the evidence for the state." It may be well doubted whether the solicitor could be required to elect in this case, as the charges all grew out of the same transaction. "The common-law rule is that, if an indictment contains charges distinct in themselves and growing out of separate transactions, the prosecutor may be made to elect or the court may quash. But where it appears that the several counts relate to one transaction, varied simply to meet the probable proof, the court will neither quash nor force an election." State v. Morrison, 85 N. C. 561. There was no error, therefore, in the ruling of the court upon the defendant's motion for an election by the solicitor.

[2] The defendants proposed to prove how far the line of the land was from the state line, with a view of showing that the prosecutor's servants and agents had come from Virginia and squatted on the land, and had then avoided the service of process and a restraining order by crossing the line again into Virginia. They further proposed to introduce in evidence a map of the premises for the use of one of the witnesses in explaining his testimony. The witness stated that he did not require it for that purpose, as he was familiar with the land, and, further, they offered deeds and other evidence for the purpose of showing the title to and possession of Allen Swamp outside of the locus in quo. All this evidence was excluded by the court, and we think properly. The facts intended to be established by the rejected evidence were not relevant to the case. It could make no difference whether the Richmond Cedar Works owned the land or not, or whether they failed to obtain service upon the prosecutor in the suit brought for the possession of the land and for an injunction. The only question in the case is whether the prosecutor's servants and agents were in possession of the particular land on which the trespass was committed, and whether the defendants attempted to oust them forcibly and violently.

[3] Forcible trespass is a crime against the possession, and not against the title.

State v. Fender, 125 N. C. 649, 34 S. E. 448. If the Richmond Cedar Works had a better title than the prosecutor to the premises, or a better right to the possession thereof, it should have been asserted by due process of law, and not by a violation of the criminal law of the state. State v. Hovis, 76 N. C. 118. The right or title to land cannot be vindicated with the bludgeon, but the party who claims the better title must, if it be denied or the actual possession of the land be refused, upon a lawful demand made for the same, resort to the peaceful methods and processes of the law for his redress and the recovery of his property. If, instead of pursuing this course, he elects to use violence, the law holds him criminally responsible for his act. State v. Webster, 121 N. C. 586, 28 S. E. 254, where it is said: "As forcible trespass is essentially an offense against the possession of another, and does not depend upon the title, it is proper to exclude evidence of title in defendants on trial under an indictment for such offense." The principle governing such cases is clearly expressed by Judge Gaston in State v. Bennett, 20 N. C. 170: "We perfectly agree with the judge that the guilt or innocence of the persons charged with respect to the offense described in the indictment did not depend upon the question whether Curry had the right to the property, or the right to its possession, but whether he had, in fact, the possession thereof at the time when that possession was charged to have been invaded with such lawless violence." It has ever been the definition of forcible trespass in this state that it is the high-handed invasion of the actual possession of another, he being present and forbidding the same, and the title is not in question. It is sufficient to constitute the offense that the act complained of be done in the presence of the owner or person in possession (presenti domino), and must involve a breach of the peace or tend thereto. There must have been something done at the time of the entry to put the prosecutor in fear or incite him to force, either to prevent the wrongs or to protect his title to the property. Whether the title is in the prosecutor or the defendant is of no moment in forcible trespass. It is the invasion of the actual possession of another, and not his constructive possession done in his presence and under such circumstances as endangers the public peace, that makes the offense. This is stated to be the law by the younger Judge Ruffin (who displayed distinguished ability in this court, and a man who was eminent in his profession and at the bar as a criminal lawyer) in the case of State v. Laney, 87 N. C. 535, and it is sustained by numerous decisions of this court. State v. McCauley, 31 N. C. 375; State v. Ross, 49 N. C. 315, 69 Am. Dec. 751; State v. Woodward, 119 N. C. 838, 25 S. E. 868. In State v. Covington, 70 N. C. 71, Judge Bynum says that, to constitute the offense of forcible trespass, there must be a demonstration of force, as with weapons or multitude of people, so as to make a breach of the peace or directly tend to it, or such as is calculated to intimidate or put in fear, citing State v. Ray, 32 N. C. 89.

[4] What is said by the present Chief Justice in State v. Mills, 104 N. C. 905, 10 S. E. 676, 17 Am. St. Rep. 706, covers this case more fully, perhaps, than any other expression to be found in the cases. In substance, it is this: The offense of forcible trespass consists in entering upon land in the actual possession of another with a strong hand. There must either be actual violence used or such demonstration of force as is calculated to intimidate, or alarm, or involve, or tend to a breach of the peace. The use of force must be such as to create a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the adversary that he must yield to the demand made upon him in order to avoid a breach of the peace—citing State v. Covington, supra; State v. Pollok, 28 N. C. 305, 42 Am. Dec. 140; State v. Pearman, 61 N. C. 371; State v. Lloyd, 85 N. C. 573. We are not called upon in this case to say whether or not it is necessary that the demonstration of force accompanying the act of invasion should consist either in a multitude of people or in the display of weapons in order to become such an entry with a strong hand as will constitute the offense. Whether the entry is sufficiently violent will depend to some extent upon the circumstances of each particular case. For example, in State v. Hinson, 83 N. C. 640, the act of a man riding into the yard or curtilage of a house occupied only by a woman, after being forbidden so to do, and remaining there cursing her, was held by this court to be such an act of force as was calculated to intimidate her or put her in fear, and therefore sufficient to constitute forcible trespass. The essential element of the offense is that the conduct of the defendant must be such as is calculated to intimidate the party in possession and to put him in fear, or to compel him, by threats of violence, which are sufficient to overawe a man of ordinary firmness, to abandon or surrender his right to the possession, or to desist from the assertion of the same.

The learned counsel for the defendant in the argument before us urged that at common law, if the party having the better right or title has lost his possession by the unlawful entry of another, he is entitled to regain it by the use of such force as is necessary for the purpose, provided it does not amount to an actual breach of the peace, whereas one not having a lawful right of entry is guilty of trespass if he goes upon the land with a strong hand, under circumstances calculated to excite terror, although the force used does not amount to a breach of the peace. This doctrine, if it ever had any real existence at the common law, and this is extremely doubtful when the authorities are carefully examined and considered, has long since been repudiated by the courts and abrogated by statute. They rely upon what is said by Judge Pearson in State v. Ross, 49 N. C. 315, 69 Am. Dec. 751, but the force of this expression was greatly weakened, if not entirely destroyed, by the decision in State v. Shepherd, 82 N. C. 614, where it will be found that Chief Justice Smith strongly intimates that the distinction thus made, if it ever existed, was swept away by our statutes. In 1 Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, c. 28, p. 495, we find the law thus stated: "It seems that at common law a man disseised of any land (if he could not prevail by fair means) might lawfully regain the possession thereof by force. But this indulgence of the common law in suffering persons to regain the lands they were unlawfully deprived of having been found by experience to be very prejudicial to the public peace, it was thought necessary by many severe laws to restrain all persons from the use of such violent methods of doing themselves justice." Blackstone, whose book on the criminal law is of the highest authority, follows Hawkins, and in his fourth volume, at page 148, he says: "An eighth offense against the public peace is that of a forcible entry and detainer, which is committed by violently taking, or keeping possession of lands, with menace, force and arms, and without the authority of law. This was formerly allowable to every person disseised or turned out of possession, unless his entry was taken away or barred. But, this being found very prejudicial to the public peace, it was thought necessary, by several statutes, to restrain all persons from the use of such violent methods, even of doing themselves justice, and much more if they had no justice in their claim." In King v. Wilson, 8th Term, 357, Lord Kenyon said that perhaps some doubt may hereafter arise respecting the statement of Mr. Serjeant Hawkins that "at common law the party may enter with force into that to which he has a legal title"; and the Court of King's Bench reversed its own opinion as to the correctness of this proposition. But, however that may be, it is very sure that the law has been changed by statute, both in England and in this country, so that now it is plain and unmistakable. This statute is the one referred to by both Hawkins and Blackstone. It was enacted in the fifth year of the reign of Richard II, and is known as chapter 7 in the compilation of the laws of England for that period, and is as follows: "And also the King defendeth, That none from thenceforth make any entry into any lands and tenements, but in case where entry is given by law; and in such case not with strong hand, nor with multitude of people, but only in peaceable and easy manner. And if any man from henceforth do to the contrary, and thereof be duly convict, he shall be punished by imprisonment of his body and thereof ransomed at the King's will." This statute was substantially adopted in this state, and will be found in the following revisions: Rev. Code, c. 49, § 1; Code, § 1028; Pell's Revisal (1908) § 3670. Mr. Pell has appended a note to the section, containing a full collection of all the cases decided by this court upon the subject, and, with reference thereto, it is conclusively and uniformly held that, whatever may have been the common law in regard to this matter, it is now unlawful, even where the party is the real owner of the land, to enter thereon with strong hand or with multitude of people, when the law authorizes him to enter only in a peaceable and easy manner, and he who enters otherwise, or with strong hand, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

The case of State v. Pollok, 26 N. C. 305, 42 Am. Dec. 140, is a decisive one against the defendants. The only difference between the two cases is that the show of force in Pollok's Case was much less formidable and impressive than it was shown to be in this case. Judge Daniel there said it was unnecessary that the prosecutor's possession was held under title, if at the very time of the forcible entry it was peaceably held and enjoyed by him, and that personal violence is not an essential ingredient of the offense, but, if there is such a show of force as to create a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the party in actual possession that he must yield to avoid a breach of the peace, and he does yield, it would be a surrender upon compulsion or force, and such as would make it a forcible trespass at common law. Proceeding, he said: "The defendant contended that the offense was not complete until some actual breach of the peace had been committed. But the law is, where the party, either by his behaviour or speech, at the time of his entry, gives those who are in possession just cause to fear that he will do them some bodily harm, if they do not give way to him, his entry is esteemed forcible, whether he cause the terror by taking with him such an unusual number of servants, or by arming himself in such a manner as plainly to indicate a design to back his pretensions by force, or by actually threatening to kill, maim, or beat those who continue in possession, or by making use of expressions which plainly imply a purpose of using force against those who make resistance"—citing Wilson's Case, 8 Term Rep. 357; Roscoe on Evidence, 374-377; 1 Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, c. 64, § 27. If the facts recited in that case constitute forcible trespass at common law, surely the facts of this case must receive a like construction, and, when the statute of Richard II is considered, there can be no doubt as to the criminality of the defendants' conduct. This statute has been adopted, we believe, in most of the states of the Union. Discussing its provisions, the court, in Scott v. Willis, 122 Ind. 1, 22 N. E. 786, said: "The owner of land who is wrongfully held out of possession by one who has no legal or equitable right may embrace the opportunity and gain peaceable possession if he can; but, unless he can obtain possession without force or show of violence, his sole remedy is to invoke the aid of legal proceedings." In Reeder v. Purdy, 41 Ill. 285, it is held that the statute against unlawful entry on land by necessary implication, if not in terms, forbids a forcible entry, even by the owner, upon the actual possession of another. "It is urged," says the court, "that the owner of real estate has a right to enter upon and enjoy his own property. Undoubtedly, if he can do so without a forcible disturbance of the possession of another, but the peace and good order of society require that he shall not be permitted to enter against the will of the occupant, and hence the common-law right to use all necessary force has been taken away. He may be wrongfully kept out of possession, but he cannot be permitted to take the law into his own hands and redress his own wrongs. * * * It has been constantly held that any entry is forcible within the meaning of this law which is made against the will of the occupant. The statutes of forcible entry and detainer should be construed as taking away the previous common-law right of forcible entry by the owner, and (as providing) that such entry must be therefore held illegal in all forms of action." This decision was approved in Chicago v. Wright, 69 Ill. 318. See, also, Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 150, 4 Am. Dec. 258; Ives v. Ives, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 235.

[5] When the undisputed facts of this case are brought to the test of these principles, we find no difficulty in adjudging the defendants guilty upon their own best showing. The defendants formed themselves into a band of armed invaders to execute their will and assert their alleged claim to the land, without regard to consequences and in defiance of law and order. They advanced upon the unpretentious and crude huts set up by the prosecutors' servants for their temporary use and comfort, with all "the pomp and circumstances of war"—a small battalion armed and equipped to meet any emergency and to overcome all opposition. This doughty band of warriors went forth to battle, bent on conquest or annihilation, and, if they had not met with instant capitulation from a submissive enemy, there can be no doubt that there would have been a gory field of conflict. As said by the Attorney General, "the battle of the Dismal Swamp would have been on, and fought to the finish." They accomplished their unlawful purpose by expelling their adversary from the premises, and yet it is argued that, having the better title, they were in the exercise of their lawful right and within the pale of the law. We do not think so. The law of the mob is not a safe rule of conduct and is not the law of the commonwealth, and the sooner this is realized by those who would essay to maintain their rights or redress their supposed grievances by becoming law-breakers themselves, the better it will be for them and the peace and good order of society. We cannot too emphatically condemn such conduct as subversive of all good government and of the cardinal principle upon which it is based. If the citizen defiantly takes the law into his own hands to assert his rights or to punish others for violating them, whatever the provocation, he will soon find that the hand of that same offended law will be laid heavily upon him as an usurper of its prerogative, and he should be made to feel its weight and its just retribution. Right does not always make might, nor does might make right, and the two united cannot be allowed to override the dignity and majesty of the law, to which law every good citizen should render willing submission and obedience. The doors to our courts are wide open, and any one may enter who feels aggrieved in respect of his person or his property, and he will find there a remedy for the full reparation of the wrong. If he will not do this, but will rather redress his wrong in his own way, he should not be surprised if he is made to pay the penalty of his own offense against the law.

The defendants' counsel cited Walker v. Chanslor, 153 Cal. 118, 94 Pac. 606, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 455, 126 Am. St. Rep. 61, and Souter v. Codman, 14 R. I. 119, 51 Am. Rep. 364, to support the position that one who has in law the title or right of possession may enter forcibly upon the land in the assertion of his right, but even a slight examination of those cases will disclose that they refer only to the civil liability of the owner for such an entry, and hold that he would not be liable in a civil action for the same; that is, in an action quare clausum, or trespass vi et armis, or for assault and battery, "even if the force used would subject the owner to an indictment at common law for a breach of the peace, or under the statute for forcible trespass or entry." They do not reach this case. The possession of the prosecutor by his servants and agents was sufficient in this case to sustain the charge of forcible trespass, the entry having been made violently and with a strong hand, and those in possession having been intimidated and put in fear.

[6] Such conduct on the part of the defendants was an assault, as it compelled the prosecutors to desist from doing what they had the lawful right to do, at least until the law had passed upon the disputed title. State v. Daniel, 136 N. C. 571, 48 S. E. 544, 103 Am. St. Rep. 970. In that case it is said: "The principle is well established that not only is a person who offers or attempts by violence to injure the person of another guilty of an assault, but no one by the show of violence has the right to put another in fear, and thereby force him to leave a place where he has the right to be. State v. Hampton, 63 N. C. 13; State v. Church, 68 N. C. 15; State v. Rawles, 65 N. C. 334; State v. Shipman, 81 N. C. 513; State v. Martin, 85 N. C. 508, 39 Am. Rep. 711; State v. Jeffreys, 117 N. C. 743, 23 S. E. 175. It is not always necessary to constitute an assault that the person whose conduct is in question should have the present capacity to inflict injury, for if by threats or a menace of violence which he attempts to execute, or by threats and a display of force, he causes another to reasonably apprehend imminent danger and thereby forces him to do otherwise than he would have done, or to abandon any lawful purpose or pursuit, he commits an assault. It is the apparently imminent danger that is threatened, rather than the present ability to inflict injury, which distinguishes violence menaced from an assault. State v. Jeffreys and State v. Martin, supra. It is sufficient if the aggressor by his conduct lead another to suppose that he will do that which he apparently attempts to do. 1 Archb. Cr. Pr., Pl. & Ev. (8th Ed. by Pomeroy), 907, 908." All of which brings us to the conclusion that there is no reason why we should halt between two opinions in passing upon the guilt of the defendants. The evidence is all one way, and so is the law. It would be a reproach to the administration of justice if the law were otherwise and we could decide the other way. If we may compare this transaction with a great historical event, when Lord George Gordon assembled his followers in St. George's Fields to march upon Parliament and present their petition against Popery, we find that, while they were engaged in the exercise of the lawful right of petition, one of the highest and most sacred constitutional rights of the subject, and while their leader was afterwards acquitted by the jury, influenced as they were by the great skill and eloquence of Erskine, and not because he was less a lawbreaker, the Court of King's Bench (Lord Mansfield presiding), before which he and his followers were tried, did not listen with much patience or consideration to the plea that the righteousness of the cause justified the offense, and many of his less fortunate adherents were convicted of treason and executed. Charles Dickens, in his graphic description of the Gordon riots in Barnaby Rudge, makes Simon Tapertit say: "What's the matter here? Do you call this order?" Well might he thus exclaim, for not even can the most sacred right be unlawfully and violently enforced, and so the court decided. 21 State Trials, 485 (563).

[7] All the testimony offered by the defendants to show a constructive possession—that is, a possession of some other part of the land under a deed or color of title—was irrelevant and properly excluded by the court.

[8, 9] There are one or two of the other exceptions which require some notice. In his address to the jury one of the prosecuting attorneys used this language: "The jury should find the defendants guilty, as their fines will be paid by the Richmond Cedar Works, a foreign corporation with headquarters in Virginia, a foreign state, where its officers sit back with slippers on their feet and direct this thing to be done." The defendants objected to these remarks at the time they were made, and the judge fully cautioned the jury, not at that time, but in his charge, to disregard them, and to confine their inquiry to the single question as to the forcible entry. We think the caution was sufficient, but, if not, the defendants should have requested the judge to make it so. This they did not do. Simmons v. Davenport, 140 N. C. 407, 53 S. E. 225. A request of this kind would have brought forth a proper response from the court. "If a party desires fuller or more specific instructions, he must ask for them, and not wait until the verdict has gone against him, and then, for the first time, complain of the charge." Simmons v. Davenport, supra. See, also, Kendrick v. Dellinger, 117 N. C. 491, 23 S. E. 438; McKinnon v. Morrison, 104 N. C. 354, 10 S. E. 513; State v. Debnam, 98 N. C. 712, 3 S. E. 742; Clark's Code (3d Ed.) pp. 535, 536; Justice v. Gallert, 131 N. C. 393, 42 S. E. 850; State v. Groves, 119 N. C. 822, 25 S. E. 819. Speaking to an objection of the same nature as this one, the court said in State v. Tyson, 133 N. C. 699, 45 S. E. 840: "A party will not be permitted to treat with indifference anything said or done during the trial that may injuriously affect his interests, thus taking the chance of a favorable verdict, and afterwards, when he has lost, assert for the first time that he has been prejudiced by what occurred. His silence will be taken as a tacit admission that at the time he thought he was suffering no harm, but was perhaps gaining an advantage, and consequently it will be regarded as a waiver of his right afterwards to object. Having been silent when he should have spoken, we will not permit him to speak when, by every consideration of fairness, he should be silent. We will not give him two chances. The law helps those who are vigilant—not those who sleep upon their rights. He who would save his rights must be prompt in asserting them."

[10, 11] But it must not be understood that we approve or commend the language of the attorney. It was a clear abuse of the privilege of counsel, as argued by defendants, to use such words in debate before the jury. The state does not ask for the conviction of a defendant except upon the facts and the law, stripped of all extraneous matter, the naked facts, and anything done which is calculated to prejudice the jury should be promptly rebuked by the presiding judge, and such instructions given to the jury as will remove all prejudice and restore their minds to an equilibrium, readjusting the unsteady balance, so that justice may be administered fairly and impartially. This is an important matter, and judges cannot be too alert or too much "on their guard" to instantly correct such abuses occurring in the course of the trial. It is their highest duty to do so, and they should at all times be firm and prompt in its discharge. Sometimes, we are aware, learned counsel use intemperate speech in the heat and zeal of an argument which they themselves regret afterwards in their cooler and calmer moments, but, this being so, it is nevertheless the duty of the judge to see that the trial is conducted fairly, without regard to that fact. Again quoting from State v. Tyson, 133 N. C. 698, 45 S. E. 840: "We conclude, therefore, that the conduct of a trial in the court below, including the argument of counsel, must be left largely to the control and direction of the presiding judge, who, to be sure, should be careful to see that nothing is said or done which would be calculated unduly to prejudice any party in the prosecution or defense of his case, and, when counsel grossly abuse their privilege at any time in the course of the trial, the presiding judge should interfere at once, when objection is made at the time, and correct the abuse. If no objection is made, while it is still proper for the judge to interfere in order to preserve the due and orderly administration of justice and to prevent prejudice and to secure a fair and impartial trial of the facts, it is not his duty to do so, in the sense that his failure to act at the time or to caution the jury in his charge will entitle the party, who alleges that he has been injured, to a new trial. Before that result can follow the judge's inaction, the objection must be entered at least before 'verdict'—citing Knight v. Houghtalling, 85 N. C. 17. In the passage taken from State v. Tyson we did not intend to decide that a failure of the judge to act immediately would be ground for a reversal (unless the abuse of privilege is so great as to call for immediate action) but merely that it must be left to the sound discretion of the court as to when is the proper time to interfere, but he must correct the abuse at some time, if requested to do so, and it is better that he do so even without a request, for he is not a mere moderator, the chairman of a meeting, but the judge appointed by the law to so control the trial and direct the course of justice that no harm can come to either party, save in the judgment of the law, founded upon the facts, and not in the least upon passion or prejudice. Counsel should be properly curbed, if necessary, to accomplish this result—the end and purpose of all law being to do justice. Every defendant "should be made to feel that the prosecuting officer is not his enemy," but that he is being treated fairly and justly. State v. Smith, 125 N. C. 618, 34 S. E. 235. In Jen- kins v. Ore. Co., 65 N. C. 563, Justice Reade said: "Zealous advocates are apt to run into improprieties; and it must generally be left to the discretion of the judge whether it best comports with decency and order to correct the error at the time by stopping or reproving the counsel or wait until he can set the matter right in his charge. It must often happen that the judge cannot anticipate that the counsel is going to say anything improper, and it may be said before the judge can prevent it, as in this case. * * * And the question was whether he was obliged to stop the counsel then and there and reprove him, or whether he would wait and correct that and all other errors when he came to charge the jury. Ordinarily this must be left to the discretion of the judge. But still it may be laid down as law, and not merely discretionary, that where the counsel grossly abuses his privilege, to the manifest prejudice of the opposite party, it is the duty of the judge to stop him then and there, and, if he fails to do so and the impropriety is gross, it is good ground for a new trial." In this case the judge responded fully and adequately in his charge to the objection, and the remarks of the counsel are therefore presumed to be harmless. They were not what may be called a "gross" breach of privilege. It must be assumed that the jurors were honest and intelligent enough to heed the warning of the court.

[12] Besides, the defendants are guilty on the admitted facts, and therefore in no degree have they been prejudiced.

[13, 14] The remaining objection to the conviction is that Davenport's associates were not aiders and abettors, or, at least, that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "If one party was committing the acts as charged, and others were present, either participating or ready and intending to aid or assist if it became necessary, all would be equally guilty." The defendant's counsel, in their excellent brief, criticize this part of the charge in the following language: "This is undoubtedly not the rule governing aiders and abettors. The rule as laid down by Ruffin, C. J., in State v. Hildreth, 31 N. C. 440, 51 Am. Dec. 369, is that 'the aider and abettor must either incite the principal to action, or else must deter others from interfering to prevent the criminal conduct of the principal.' The very limit of the rule is the aider and abettor would be guilty with the principal if he was present with knowledge of the principal, ready to aid or assist. The reason is that this knowledge on the part of the principal emboldens him because he has the assurance of assistance. 12 Cyc. 183." Even within this definition of the term, "aider and abettor," we find no difficulty in adjudging the other defendants guilty as principals, upon the facts of the case, for in misdemeanors there are no accessories. A person aids and abets when he has "that kind of connection with the commission of a crime which, at common law, rendered the person guilty as a principal in the second degree. It consisted in being present at the time and place, and in doing some act to render aid to the actual perpetrator of the crime, though without taking a direct share in its commission." Black's Dict. p. 54, citing 4 Blackstone, 34. An abettor is one who gives "aid and comfort," or who either commands, advises, instigates, or encourages another to commit a crime—a person who, by being present, by words or conduct, assists or incites another to commit the criminal act (Black's Dict. p. 6); or one "who so far participates in the commission of the offense as to be present for the purpose of assisting, if necessary, and in such case he is liable as a principal." 1 McClain, Cr. Law, § 199. Within any well-recognized definition, the codefendants of Davenport were at least "aiders and abettors," if they were not principals. Rex v. Gordon, 21 State Trials, 485.

We have discussed this case at much greater length than we would otherwise have done, because the learned and able counsel for the defendants insisted most earnestly and zealously that no forcible trespass had been committed under the law as laid down by the standard authorities, and we therefore deemed it proper to review and restate the law in a matter so vital to the tranquility and welfare of the community, and to do so in no uncertain terms, so that it may be well understood that individuals cannot usurp the power of the law, and by their own procedure and in a violent manner either protect or assert their rights of property. Such conduct is "against the peace and dignity of the state, and contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided." Again, we say that the cry of the mob must not be mistaken for the voice of the law.

It may be added that the defendants could have been properly indicted and convicted either of a forcible trespass, a riot, or rout (State v. Hathcock, 29 N. C. 52; State v. York, 70 N. C. 66) or an unlawful assembly (2 McClain, Cr. Law, § 1003), all misdemeanors at common law, and the sentence pronounced in this case, by the able and humane judge, which was mild considering the aggravated circumstances, has therefore worked no legal injury to them.

There is no apparent error in the case, and it must be so certified.

No error.

GADSDEN v. HOME FERTILIZER & CHEMICAL CO.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 222*)—OBJECTIONS—PRESENTATION BELOW.

Appellee cannot object to the consideration on appeal of a motion for new trial on the ground that the reasons stated in the motion were not stated in the written notice of the motion served, where objection was not made below where it could have been obviated.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 127*)—JUDGMENTS APPEALABLE—DEFAULT JUDGMENTS.

Ordinarily a default judgment is not appealable unless the default goes to the foundation of the cause of action or the court's jurisdiction, when it may be corrected by appeal.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 112*)—DEFAULT—EFFECT.

A default only admits things well pleaded, and only affects rights with respect to matters necessarily admitted by the default, so that, if the complaint does not state a cause of action, only a judgment of dismissal may be rendered; and, if it states facts entitling plaintiff only to a certain kind or extent of relief, a default judgment awarding a different kind or of greater relief is improper; and hence, under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 169, providing that defendant shall be deemed to have waived all objections to the complaint specified in section 165 as grounds of demurrer if not taken by demurrer or answer, except the objection that the complaint does not state a cause of action, a default judgment does not waive an objection that the complaint does not state a cause of action.

4. SALES (§ 418*)—SPECIAL DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

To recover special damages for breach of contract, it must appear that defendant knew when making the contract of the special circumstances from which the damages might reasonably be expected to result, so that, upon breach of defendant's contract to furnish plaintiff fertilizer, in reliance upon which plaintiff had prepared his land and arranged to plant certain crops, plaintiff could not recover damages from delay in planting and from being compelled to plant without fertilizer, where it is not shown that defendant knew when the contract was made of the special use to which plaintiff intended to put the fertilizer or of any scarcity in fertilizer which would prevent plaintiff from buying from others, if he failed to furnish it.

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 74*)—GROUNDS—INSUFFICIENCY OF PLEADINGS.

A motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was not supported by the evidence as to special damages awarded necessarily involved the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint as to special damages as well as the proof thereof; it being competent to prove only that which is alleged.

6. DAMAGES (§ 208*)—DIRECTION OF VERDICT—UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 267, providing that, when the damages sought are unliquidated, the relief awarded on a default judgment shall be ascertained by a jury, the court cannot direct a verdict for plaintiff upon default in an action for unliquidated damages for breach of contract, though the evidence be undisputed.

7. TRIAL (§ 171*)—DIRECTION OF VERDICT—ON DEFAULT.

The court may direct a verdict on default upon the same grounds upon which it may direct a verdict where the issues are litigated.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Emanuel J. Gadsden against the Home Fertilizer & Chemical Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed unless a remittitur is filed, in which event judgment is affirmed.

Purdy & Bland, for appellant. Lee & Moise, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action for damages for breach of contract. In substance, the complaint alleges: That on January 18, 1910, defendant sold plaintiff five tons of fertilizer at the price of $144.60; that plaintiff paid $68.69, part of the agreed price, and defendant agreed to deliver the fertilizer at Claremont, but failed, after demand, to do so; that, relying upon defendant's performance of the contract, plaintiff prepared his land and made the other arrangements necessary to plant his crops of corn and cotton; but, by reason of defendant's breach of the contract, he was delayed in planting, and compelled to plant his crops without fertilization, to his damage $250; that defendant also refused, after demand, to return the money paid by plaintiff. The prayer is for judgment for $318.69.

The defendant made default. The claim for damages being unliquidated, under section 267, Code Civ. Proc., the relief to be afforded had to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury. The plaintiff gave testimony in support of the allegations of his complaint. He testified that he planted about 16 acres of corn and about 32 of cotton, and that in his opinion he did not make more than half as much as he would have made if defendant had furnished him the fertilizer according to the contract; that he had some fertilizer, and, if he had gotten that which he contracted for, he could have made nearly ten bales of cotton, and might have made more, and he thought his damages amounted to $250. That is the substance of the evidence as to damages. The court directed the jury to find a verdict for plaintiff for $318.69—the sum demanded in the complaint. Some days after the rendition of the verdict, but during the term, and before judgment was entered upon it, the defendant served notice of a motion to set aside the service of the summons and complaint, and, falling in that, to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, on the ground that it had never been served with process and had had no notice of the action until after the verdict. The motion was supported by an affidavit of the treasurer of the defendant company to the effect that Mr. T. S. Sumter, upon whom the summons and complaint was served as the agent of the defendant, which is a foreign corporation, was not, in fact, its agent. At the hearing of the motion, defendant's attorney stated that, if his motion to set aside the service was refused, he would move on the minutes to set aside the verdict, on the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict for damages, and on the further ground that the court erred in directing the verdict, instead of leaving it to the jury to find the amount of damages. The defendant undertook to prove by Mr. Sumter that he was not its agent, but Mr. Sumter testified to the contrary—that he was defendant's agent, and that, when the summons and complaint were served on him, he mailed them to defendant. There was other evidence tending to prove that he was defendant's agent, and that defendant had held him out as such. There was no error, therefore, in refusing to vacate the service.

Upon the motion to set aside the verdict on the grounds stated, the court ruled that plaintiff having proved all the allegations of his complaint, and his testimony being undisputed, there was no error in directing the verdict, and refused the motion.

[1] Before discussing the appeal from this ruling, it is necessary to dispose of an objection to its consideration by this court, which has been interposed by respondent, to wit, that the grounds stated were not mentioned in the written notice of the motion served upon him. This objection comes too late. These grounds were presented to and considered by the circuit court without objection. If the objection made here had been made there, it might have been obviated. Hence the ruling is properly before this court.

The defendant appeals both from the order refusing its motion and also from the judgment.

[2] Ordinarily no appeal lies from a judgment by default. Odom v. Burch, 52 S. C. 305, 29 S. E. 726. But where the defect in the judgment is radical—that is, one which goes to the foundation of plaintiff's cause of action, or to the authority of the court to render the judgment—it may be remedied by appeal. In McMahon v. Pugh, 62 S. C. 506, 40 S. E. 961, it was held that in a default case the court can render any judgment to which the plaintiff is entitled under the facts alleged in his complaint, not inconsistent with the prayer thereof, and, if there be error in granting relief beyond the scope of the allegations of the complaint, the remedy is by appeal. At page 510 the court quotes with approval the following from Pomeroy: "If every fact necessary to the action is stated, the plaintiff may, even when no answer is put in, have any relief to which the facts entitle him, consistent with that demanded in the complaint."

[3] The authorities, with practical unanimity, agree that a default admits only what has been well pleaded, and that it does not forfeit or affect the rights of a defendant, except as to matters necessarily admitted by the default. 23 Cyc. 751. Therefore, if the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, any judgment thereon, except one of dismissal, goes beyond the allegations of the complaint; and so, if the complaint states facts which entitle plaintiff only to a certain kind of relief, or to relief only to a certain extent, a judgment by default which gives a different kind of relief, or relief to a greater extent, is without authority of law and cannot be sustained. In Gillian v. Gillian, 65 S. C. 129, 43 S. E. 386, Mr. Justice Gary, speaking for the court, quotes with approval from 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 115, as follows: "The defendant, by waiving a contest and suffering a default to be taken against him, admits the truth of the allegations set out in the plaintiff's declaration or complaint; and the same rule applies to a judgment final after overruling a demurrer. Hence the default authorizes the entry of any judgment warranted by the facts alleged. And, where the facts pleaded constitute a cause of action, the effect of the default is to establish it definitely. But the default does not admit that the facts pleaded are sufficient to constitute a cause of action, as the effect of the confession is limited to the material issuable facts well pleaded in the declaration or complaint. Nor does it admit an allegation which constitutes a mere conclusion of law. The facts pleaded must accordingly be sufficient to form a legal basis for the judgment taken by default, or it will be reversed on appeal or set aside on proper application." To the same effect, see 23 Cyc. 740, 752, 764. This doctrine is in conformity with section 169 of the Code, which provides that the defendant shall be deemed to have waived all the objections to the complaint which are specified in section 165 as grounds of demurrer, if the same are not taken either by demurrer or answer, except the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. If the last-named ground of objection is not waived by a failure to raise it either by demurrer or answer, it necessarily follows that it is not waived by a default, which is merely a failure to demur or answer. The complaint in this case fails to state the facts necessary to entitle plaintiff to recover the special damages which were awarded by the verdict.

[4] In an action to recover damages for breach of contract, when the damages sought to be recovered are special, it is necessary to allege and prove that defendant had notice at the time of making the contract of the special circumstances from which such damages might reasonably be expected to result. Towles v. Railroad Co., 83 S. C. 501, 65 S. E. 638. The complaint in this case contains no allegation, nor is there any evidence that defendant knew, when the contract was made, of the special use which plaintiff intended to make of the fertilizer, or of any scarcity of fertilizer which would prevent plaintiff from buying what he needed from other dealers, if defendant failed to furnish it. Matheson v. Railway, 79 S. C. 157, 60 S. E. 437. Therefore the contention of appellant that as to the damages recovered the verdict is wholly unsupported by evidence must be sustained.

[5] While the motion on circuit was not based on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for the special damages found by the verdict, nevertheless the ground taken that the verdict, as to the damages found, is without the support of any competent evidence, necessarily involves the insufficiency of the allegations of the complaint, because it is competent to prove only what is alleged, and, as the allegations are insufficient, necessarily the proof is also. Upon the complaint in this case a judgment for special damages is without authority of law, and cannot be sustained.

[6] The court erred also in directing the verdict. The statute requires that, when the damages sought to be recovered are not liquidated, the relief to be afforded in default cases shall be ascertained by the verdict of a jury. Code, § 267. If the court may direct the verdict in such cases, why may it not ascertain the relief to be afforded without the aid of a jury? But clearly it has no authority to do so, because the statute forbids it. Hence the verdict is without authority of law, for it is no more than the finding of the court. From this it must not be inferred that the court has no right to direct the verdict in any default case.

[7] It may direct the verdict in such cases upon the same grounds upon which it may direct a verdict in litigated cases; but when the damages are not liquidated, and the evidence, though undisputed, is of such a nature that men might reasonably differ as to the amount of damages, the question of amount must be submitted to the jury.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, unless plaintiff shall, within 20 days after notice of the filing of the remittitur in that court, remit all of the judgment in excess of the sum of $68.69, with interest thereon from January 18, 1910, and upon his doing so, the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

1. RAILROADS (§ 89*)—RIGHT TO CROSS OTHER ROADS—GRADE CROSSING—CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 9, § 6, providing that any railroad shall have the right to intersect with or cross any other road, is not violated by Civ. Code 1902, § 2179, denying the right to cross at grade except by consent of the Railroad Commission and this only in the manner prescribed, since the constitutional right to cross does not necessarily imply the right to cross at grade.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 234-239; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 91*)—CROSSING OTHER RAILROAD—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Where a railroad obtains an order from the Railroad Commission authorizing it to cross the right of way of another company, provided that such crossing be protected with an interlocking switch, and that the crossing and switch be subject to the approval of the commission, and by another order the commission imposes conditions as to furnishing preliminary plans and as to the method of construction and operation, the railroad then has no absolute right to make a crossing or to institute condemnation proceedings to acquire a right of way.

3. RAILROADS (§ 91*)—SUPERVISION BY RAILROAD COMMISSION—REVOCATION OF ORDERS.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 2179, which gives the Railroad Commission certain powers as to grades and crossings, no restrictions are imposed on the commission as to the terms and conditions upon which it will consent to such crossings, and it has the power to withhold its consent altogether or to grant it on such terms and conditions as it may see fit, and, so long as it acts within the law and a reasonable discretion, it is subject to no control save that of the Legislature, and its requirements that a railroad petitioning for a right to a grade crossing furnish the commission with preliminary plans for an interlocking switch, that all necessary material be assembled before the work is begun, and that no engine or train be operated over such tracks until inspected by the commission are within its authority and discretion.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 101*)—VESTED RIGHTS—REGULATION OF RAILROADS.

Where a railroad commission made orders granting the petition of a road for the right to cross another road at grade with certain condition as to plans and methods of construction and operation to be approved by the commission, the orders were not final, but under the express provisions of Civ. Code 1902, § 2179, were provisional, and before the approval of the commission gave the road no vested rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 209-211; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 81*)—POLICE POWER.

The state cannot by contract barter away or divest itself of the police power, since the public safety is paramount to any vested rights of its citizens.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 148; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 818*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDINGS—HEARINGS BEFORE BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS.

The Railroad Commission on the petition of a road made conditional orders granting it the right to a grade crossing over another road, provided that such crossing was protected with an interlocking switch, and that the plans for it and for its construction and operation be approved by the commission, and on a subsequent meeting to receive the report of its engineer as to the plans submitted by the petitioner, and having before it the full evidence taken at former hearings, the commission extended its inquiry beyond a consideration of the plans, and, over the petitioner's objection, ruled that its consent was still an open matter and withheld consent upon consideration of the crossing's danger to the public, and the petitioner did not make the point that it was taken by surprise or was unprepared, but without asking for a further hearing relied upon the commission's previous orders as having expressed its final consent. Held that, to meet the requirements of due process of law, it is not necessary that hearings by boards and commissions shall be conducted with the same formalities as proceedings in courts, and that the petitioner was not deprived of a right to a hearing on the commission's revocation or refusal of consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 949; Dec. Dig. § 818.*]

7. MANDAMUS (§ 7*)—NATURE AND SCOPE OF REMEDY.

The issuance of a writ of mandamus is not a matter of strict legal right, but rests in the sound discretion of the court.

8. MANDAMUS (§ 73*)—ACTS OF BOARDS AND OFFICERS—MINISTERIAL ACTS.

Where a state railroad commission grants a petitioning railroad the right to a grade crossing upon condition that plans be submitted to the commission for its approval, mandamus will lie to compel its consideration of the plans submitted.

9. MANDAMUS (§ 73*)—ACTS OF PUBLIC BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS—MATTERS OF DISCRETION.

Mandamus will not issue to control the discretion or judgment vested by law in public commissions, unless the action of the commission with respect to the matter before it is so clearly arbitrary and capricious as not to admit of two reasonable opinions; and, where a railroad commission after granting a right to a grade crossing subject to its approval has found that the proposed crossing is unsafe, and that no other plans can be devised for a grade crossing at that place, and that the proposed plan should not be consented to, and there is evidence to support such conclusion, the court has no authority to substitute its judgment for that of the commission, and a writ of mandamus will not issue.

HYDRICK, J. The petitioner prays for a writ of mandamus, directed to the Railroad Commission, requiring it to consider and approve its plans for a grade crossing of the tracks of the Seaboard Air Line Railway at Front street in the town of Cheraw. The efforts of the petitioner to make this crossing have resulted in considerable litigation. 88 S. C. 464, 477, 480, 71 S. E. 34, 39, 40. For the sake of brevity, the two companies will be referred to as the "A. C. L." and the "S. A. L."

Section 2179, Civ. Code 1902, reads: "No railroad shall be constructed to cross another railroad at the same level therewith, or across navigable or tide waters, without the consent, in writing, of the railroad commissioners, and in such manner as they shall prescribe. It shall be unlawful for any corporation proceeding to construct a branch or extension, or otherwise to take any proceedings contemplating a new crossing of one railroad with another, at the same level therewith, unless such crossing shall first have been approved, in writing, by the railroad commissioners, and the preliminary approval of any plan for such crossing shall always be made subject to revision by the commissioners. And the court of common pleas shall have full equity jurisdiction, on information filed by the Attorney General, in case of any violation of the provisions of this section."

Upon the petition of the A. C. L., after notice to the S. A. L., and a hearing had, on September 14, 1910, the commission gave its consent to the crossing in the following order, dated September 22, 1910: "After due consideration, the consent of this commission is hereby given to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company to cross the main line track of the Seaboard Air Line Railway on Front street in the town of Cheraw, S. C., with its track at grade: Provided, that said crossing be protected with an interlocking switch, and crossing to be subject to the approval of the commission: And provided, further, that all expenses incurred by said crossing be paid by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company." It appears from the record that, when this consent was given, none of the commissioners had personally examined the place of the proposed crossing. But thereafter, on December 28th, they held a meeting in Cheraw, in connection with this controversy, and while there the S. A. L. petitioned for a rehearing on the matter of the commission giving its consent to the crossing, which was refused in the following order: "(1) The petition of the Seaboard Air Line Company for a rehearing in this matter is dismissed. (2) The permission of the Atlantic Coast Line railroad company to cross track of the Seaboard Air Line Company on September 22, 1910, contemplated the furnishing to this commission of preliminary plans for an interlocking switch and crossing and the proper erection of the same, subject to the approval of this commission. (3) That all material necessary to the completion of the interlocking switch and crossing, as ordered, be assembled before any work on the same is begun, and that the work of erection be carried on to completion simultaneously. (4) That no engine or train be operated over said crossing until the same has been inspected by the official engineer of this commission and accepted by the commission." From this order, one of the commissioners dissented, on the ground that his examination of the place that day had satisfied him that the crossing at Front street was and always would be too dangerous to the traveling public, and would interfere too much with the use by the S. A. L. of its main line, which objections could be materially lessened by a grade crossing at Second street, one block from Front street, or by an overhead crossing at Front street. On December 30th the A. C. L. notified the commission that it had assembled at Cheraw all the materials necessary to the completion of the interlocking plant and crossing, as authorized by the order of September 22d, and requested that the commission send its engineer to supervise its immediate placing. Accordingly the commission sent an engineer, who made an examination of the materials assembled for the purpose of putting in the crossing, and a meeting of the commission was held on January 2d for the purpose of hearing his report, and also for the purpose of considering the plans and ascertaining whether they came up to the standard which should be required for safety. Both roads were notified of the meeting, and both were represented by their engineers and attorneys. In the meantime the personnel of the commission had been changed. The term of office of one of the commissioners who had favored giving consent to the crossing, had expired, and his successor had qualified and taken his place on the commission. This fact is mentioned merely to explain a change in the attitude of the commission with respect to the matter. At this hearing, on January 2d, a great deal of testimony was heard and discussion had as to whether the plans proposed made the crossing safe. The petitioner contended that the commission had given its consent to the crossing in its order of September 22d, and that that consent was final and irrevocable, and that all the commission could do at that time was to consider and approve or disapprove of the plans proposed by it. A majority of the commission, consisting of the new member and the member who dissented from the order of December 28th, overruled this contention, and held that the matter of consent was still open, and that the commission still had the right to inquire into the safety of the proposed crossing, and to withhold their consent, if they concluded that it would be unsafe. The new commissioner announced that he had not seen the place of the proposed crossing, and that, until he had, he could not intelligently decide whether the commission should consent to a grade crossing at that place, or whether the plans of the crossing proposed should be approved or disapproved. After having heard the evidence and arguments as to the sufficiency of the plans proposed, and after having inspected the place, he agreed with the commissioner who dissented from the order of December 28th, and they, being a majority of the commission, passed the following order, dated January 6, 1911: "(1) That this commission should not consent to the present plan of the crossing by the Atlantic Coast Line of the Seaboard Air Line on Front street, as the same is dangerous to the traveling public and detrimental to the public at large. (2) That this commission should consent to a crossing of the Seaboard Air Line railway by the Atlantic Coast Line railway at Second street, under such plans as this commission will approve, and in the event that the Seaboard Air Line carries out the offer hereinbefore stated. (3) That in the event the said Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company shall not accept of said offer, but still insists on crossing the Seaboard Air Line at Front street, then that this commission shall not consent to any grade crossing, but require the said Atlantic Coast Line to cross the same on an overhead bridge, which the ground will admit of in a practical way, the plans of such overhead bridge to be approved by this commission." From this order the other commissioner dissented, sustaining the position taken by petitioner, as above stated. Thereafter, on May 24, 1911, the petitioner herein filed a petition with the commission, requesting the commission to consider and approve the plans proposed by it, taking the position that the commission had not at the hearing on January 2d, or at any time, considered and approved or disapproved its proposed plans for the crossing. The commission dismissed the petition, and this proceeding was commenced to compel the commission to consider and approve the plans proposed by petitioner.

[1] The first contention of the petitioner is that under the Constitution and statute the commission has no power to deny one railroad the right to cross another at grade, where the fulfillment of its duty to the public by the road seeking to cross requires it; and that in such cases the power of the commission is limited to an approval of the manner of crossing. This contention is based upon section 6 of article 9 of the Constitution, which reads: "Any railroad * * * organized under the laws of this state, shall have the right * * * to intersect with or cross any other railroad," etc. There are several sections of the Code which in similar terms give railroads the right to cross each other. But neither the section of the Constitution above quoted nor any statute gives one railroad the right in so many words to cross another at grade, and the right to cross does not necessarily imply the right to cross at grade. On the contrary, section 2179 denies that right, except by consent of the commission, and then only in such manner as it shall prescribe; and there is nothing in the provisions of that section in conflict with the section of the Constitution above cited. Notwithstanding that section of the Constitution, it would be perfectly competent for the Legislature, in the exercise of the police power of the state, to prohibit grade crossings altogether, and require all existing grade crossing to be changed, and put above or below grade. New York, etc., R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 14 Sup. Ct. 437, 38 L. Ed. 289; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Nebraska, 170 U. S. 57, 18 Sup. Ct. 513, 42 L. Ed. 948; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, 26 Sup. Ct. 341, 50 L. Ed. 596.

[2] The next position taken by the petitioner is that the order of January 6th is void, first, because the order of September 22d, being a judgment or quasi judgment, was final and irrevocable; and, second, because the order of January 6th was made without giving the petitioner a hearing, after the petitioner had acquired vested rights, in reliance upon the order of September 22d, and it therefore operates to deprive petitioner of its property without due process of law. The fundamental error in this contention is in assuming that the commission ever gave its consent to the crossing. In A. C. L. v. S. A. L., 88 S. C. 464, 71 S. E. 34, the court held that the orders of September 22d and December 28th gave only "the preliminary approval of the commission to a crossing by the Coast Line at this point, under very minute and substantial conditions, to wit, that the crossing was to be protected by an interlocking switch, and that all preliminary plans for the crossing and interlocking switch were to be submitted before the work was attempted." And it was distinctly held in that case that those orders gave petitioner "no absolute right to make the crossing." Under the terms of the statute, the petitioner's right to proceed was conditioned upon the consent of the commission. Until that consent was obtained, it was unlawful for petitioner to institute condemnation proceedings for the purpose of acquiring rights of way, or to take any other step contemplating the making of such crossing. The law not only did not give the petitioner the right to make the crossing, without the consent of the commission, but positively forbade it. Therefore neither the petitioner nor any others interested in the matter, had any right to take any steps in reliance upon the orders of September and December, because upon their face they were conditional, and it was not known whether the petitioner would be able to comply with the condition.

for such crossing shall always be made subject to revision by the commissioners." The Legislature has imposed no restrictions upon the commission as to the terms and conditions upon which it will consent to such crossings. Therefore it has the power to refuse its consent altogether, or to grant it upon such terms and conditions as it may see fit. And, so long as it acts within the law and a reasonable discretion, it is subject to no control save that of the Legislature. The condition upon which the consent of September 22d and December 28th was given was clearly within the law and the discretion of the commission, and it was a condition precedent, and no rights could vest or attach under the consent, until the condition had been fully complied with.

[4] In A. C. L. v. S. A. L., supra, the court said: "No plans of an interlocking switch crossing were ever submitted to the Railroad Commission until January 2, 1911. Hence any attempt to put in the crossing previous to January 2, 1911, was a violation of the orders of the commission, and, inasmuch as the commission did not approve the plans submitted on January 2, 1911, but disapproved them, the attempt to put in the crossing thereafter was unauthorized by the commission." If the petitioner had no right to act upon the orders of September 22d and December 28th, and the court expressly decided that it had not, it necessarily follows that its contention that it acquired vested rights in reliance upon those orders, cannot be sustained. But the truth is, and the record shows it, that petitioner acquired all the necessary rights of way, except across the S. A. L. tracks, before it ever applied for the consent of the commission to make the crossing, and, if it has acquired any rights subsequent to the date of the orders giving a conditional consent to the crossing, the record fails to show what they are and when they were acquired.

[5] But even if it be assumed that, acting in reliance upon those orders, the petitioner did acquire vested rights, it does not follow that the commission could not withdraw its consent to the crossing. The public safety is paramount to the vested rights of the citizen. The police power cannot be bartered away. In Chicago, etc., R. C. v. Nebraska, supra, Mr. Justice Shiras, speaking for the court, said: "Usually, where a contract, not contrary to public policy, has been entered into between parties competent to contract, it is not within the power of either party to withdraw from its terms without the consent of the other; and the obligation of such a contract is constitutionally protected from hostile legislation. Where, however, the respective parties are not private persons, dealing with matters and things with which the public has no concern, but are persons or corporations whose rights and powers were created for public purposes, by legislative acts, and where the subject-matter of the contract is one which affects the safety and welfare of the public, other principles apply. Contracts of the latter description are held to be within the supervising power and control of the Legislature when exercised to protect the public safety, health, and morals, and that clause of the federal Constitution protects contracts from legislative action cannot in every case be successfully invoked. The presumption is that, when such contracts are entered into, it is with the knowledge that parties cannot, by making agreements on subjects involving the rights of the public, withdraw such subjects from the police power of the Legislature." But, as we have seen, the petitioner knew by the terms of the consent and by the terms of the statute, which provides that "the preliminary approval of any plans for such crossing shall always be made subject to revision by the commissioners," that it had no right to assume and act upon the assumption that consent would finally be given.

[6] The petitioner's next contention is that it has never had a hearing upon the right of the commission to revoke the consent given by the orders of September 22d and December 28th. It has been shown that no consent was given, and therefore there was no revocation, but merely a refusal to consent. But, waiving that, the record shows that at the meeting held on January 2d, which had been called to receive the report of the commission's engineer upon the plans proposed by the petitioner, a majority of the commission ruled against the objection of the petitioner, and after repeated and extended arguments that the question of the consent of the commission to the crossing was still an open matter, and that it had not been finally determined. The inquiry at that hearing was therefore not restricted to a consideration of the fitness of the proposed plans, but took the broader scope whether the commission should consent to a grade crossing at Front street at all, on account of the danger to the traveling public resulting from the peculiar physical conditions at that point, on account of the grade and curvature of the S. A. L. track. While petitioner strenuously objected to the consideration of that question, it did not make the point that it was taken by surprise, or was unprepared to meet that issue. Nor did it ask for further time to meet it, but it chose rather to rely upon its legal position that the orders of September 22d and December 28th giving consent were final. Nor has it been suggested that petitioner could or would have made any different showing, if the meeting had been called specifically for the purpose of considering the question of consent. Moreover, it will be noticed that petitioner has never asked the commission for a hearing upon that point. Nor has it asked this court to compel the commission to give it such a hearing, but it has at all times since the order of September 22d strenuously objected to any such hearing. Certainly, under such circumstances, it will not be heard to say that it has been deprived of its vested rights without a hearing. But the truth is the hearing on January 2d was quite as full on the question whether the commission should give its consent to the crossing, so far as the element of danger is concerned, and that is the only ground upon which consent was refused, as was the hearing which resulted in the order of September 22d. Besides, the record shows that the new commissioner and the others had before them the evidence taken at the first hearing, which, as also appears from the record, was taken by one of the commissioners, in the absence of the others, and reported to the full body. To meet the requirement of due process of law, it is not necessary that hearings before boards and commissions shall be conducted with the same formalities that characterize proceedings in courts.

The next question is, Has the commission considered the plans of the crossing proposed by the petitioner? The record shows that the hearing of January 2d was devoted almost exclusively to the consideration of these plans, in connection with the question whether any plans could be devised which would afford adequate protection to the public for a grade crossing at Front street, and the decision of the commission shows they were considered and disapproved.

[7] The issuance of the writ of mandamus is not a matter of strict legal right, but it rests in the sound discretion of the court. Nothing is better settled than that mandamus will not be issued to control the discretion or judgment vested by law in public officers.

[8] If the commission had not already considered and rejected the plans proposed by the petitioner, the court could compel their consideration by the commission. Abbeville v. McMillan, 52 S. C. 60, 29 S. E. 540.

[9] But it could not direct the result of that consideration, unless the action of the commission with respect to the matter was so clearly arbitrary and capricious as not to admit of two reasonable opinions. Mauldin v. Matthews, 81 S. C. 414, 62 S. E. 695, 128 Am. St. Rep. 919. The commission is invested by law with the authority to decide the questions of fact in such cases, and it is a body peculiarly fitted to decide such questions. Therefore its decision of questions of fact, unless wholly without evidence, is final and conclusive. Now, in this case, the commission has found that the proposed crossing is unsafe, and that no plans can be devised for a grade crossing at Front street which will adequately protect the public. It has also found that a grade crossing may be made at Second street, which will be reasonably safe, and that an overhead crossing at Front street is feasible. It has also found that the proposed plan of crossing at Front street is dangerous, and should not be consented to, and that conclusion is not without evidence to support it. Even if the court did not concur in the findings of the commission, nevertheless it has no authority or disposition to substitute its judgment and discretion for that of the commission.

Wherefore the petition is dismissed.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 363*)—AUTHORITY—SALES OF LAND.

An administrator cannot sell, at private sale, land the title to which is in the estate he represents, except "wild uncultivated" land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1492; Dec. Dig. § 363.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 380*)—AUTHORITY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The evidence was not such as to require a finding that either of the tracts of land involved was not "wild, uncultivated" land at the time the administrators, respectively, made private sales thereof under orders granted by the court of ordinary; and the trial judge erred in directing a verdict for the defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 380.*]

Atkinson, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Charlton County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Action by the W. J. Downing Lumber Company against Medlin & Sundry. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Wilson, Bennett & Lambdin, for plaintiff in error. Toomer & Reynolds, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff in error filed its petition to have the defendants in error enjoined from cutting and removing timber from two described tracts of land, and from using the timber for turpentine purposes, or otherwise interfering with it. The plaintiff claimed title under deeds from the administrators, whose intestates had grants, respectively, to the two tracts of land from the state. Upon the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] The administrators who made the deeds each obtained an order from the ordinary appointing him, authorizing him to sell the tract of land of his intestate as wild land at public or private sale. The administrators, respectively, made private sales of the two tracts of land, and deeded the same to the plaintiff. The bill of exceptions recites that upon the conclusion of the evidence the court "directed a verdict for the defendants, in language following, namely: 'It appearing to the court that at the time the deeds were made to these lots of land Nos. 5 and 6 to the plaintiff in this suit that the defendants were in possession of lots in controversy, and that thereupon these deeds being made by the administratrix of the estates of Melton and Rogers, the plaintiff cannot recover in this suit, for the reason that, as stated in Code 1895, § 3457 (Code 1910, § 4033), an administrator cannot sell property held adversely to the estate by a third person. He must first recover possession. This having not been done by the administratrix aforesaid, a verdict is directed for the defendants. This verdict is directed solely and only upon this ground.'" The plaintiff excepted to the direction of a verdict, on the ground, among others, that the section of the Code referred to, providing that an administrator cannot sell lands held adversely to the estate, "is not applicable to a sale of wild lands." The plaintiff in error contends that the statute intended to give an administrator the right to sell wild land at private sale, though held at the time adversely to the estate. Under the common law, and under the statute of 32 Henry VIII, c. —, a deed to lands at the time in the adverse possession of others was void. The act of 1858 (Acts 1858, p. 56) gave ordinaries the right to pass orders authorizing an administrator to sell, at private sale, "wild and scattered lands lying and being in different counties in this state." This act is codified in Civil Code 1910, § 4024, which is as follows: "On application by the administrator and due notice advertised as hereinafter provided in case of land, the ordinary may grant an order authorizing the administrator to sell, at private sale, wild uncultivated lands lying in counties other than that of the administration: Provided, no objection is filed by any one interested in the estate, and the ordinary is satisfied that such sale is preferable." In 1859 (Acts 1859, p. 24) an act was passed which is codified in Civil Code 1910, § 4185, and which reads as follows: "A deed to lands, made while the same are held adversely to the maker of the deed, is not void."

Civil Code 1910, § 4033, which is the same as section 3457 of the Code of 1895, referred to by the court when he directed a verdict is as follows: "An administrator cannot sell property held adversely to the estate by a third person; he must first recover possession." Cultivated land in the adverse possession of any one would not be wild land, and could not be sold as such under Civil Code 1910, § 4024, above quoted. The provision of Civil Code 1910, § 4033, that "an administrator cannot sell property held adversely to the estate by a third person," is an exception to the general law in Civil Code 1910, § 4185, providing that "A deed to lands, made while the same are held adversely to the maker of the deed, is not void," and the word "property" in the section first above quoted applies to sales of all kinds of property. Orders for the sale of wild lands must be granted upon written application therefor, after publication of notice in the same manner as in instances where orders for the sale of land other than wild land are granted; and an order for the sale of wild land may require it to be sold at public sale. It has been many times held that a public sale of land other than "wild land" by administrators, while in the adverse possession of others, and a deed in pursuance thereof, conveys no title. Weitman v. Thiot, 64 Ga. 11; Coggins v. Griswold, 64 Ga. 323; Lowe v. Bivins, 112 Ga. 341, 37 S. E. 374; Hanesley v. Bagley, 109 Ga. 346, 348, 34 S. E. 584; Hall v. Armor, 68 Ga. 449; Heard v. Phillips, 101 Ga. 691, 31 S. E. 216, 44 L. R. A. 369; Davitt v. So. Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 665, 84 S. E. 327. The main reason that such sales are made void is that property, though actually belonging to the estate, would not likely bring its full value when held adversely to the estate and the administrator could not give possession. Even if land in the adverse possession of any one can be said to be "wild land," the same reasons which would make unwise the sale of land other than wild land in the possession of another would apply to wild land in the adverse possession of another. However, we do not see how land in the adverse possession of any one can be said to be "wild land." It makes no difference whether the land be designated as "wild land," or by some other description. The fact that it is held adversely to the estate makes a sale of it by the administrator of the estate void. If the land is not "wild uncultivated land," under the statute the administrator has no right to sell it at private sale; nor would he have the right to sell it at public or private sale, if it was "wild, uncultivated land" and held adversely to the estate, even if land held adversely to the estate could in any case properly be denominated "wild land."

[2] 2. We do not think the evidence such as warranted the court in directing a verdict for the defendants on the ground on which he directed it. Under the evidence the question as to whether the lands were "wild, uncultivated lands" when the private sales and deeds by the administrators were made to the plaintiff was one for the jury. There were in evidence grants from the state to the two lots. One grant was to Zackariah Melton and the other to Davis Rogers, each conveying one of the lots of land. The deed of the administrator of Rogers to the plaintiff was dated July 6, 1906, and was made under an order of the ordinary granted at the July term, 1906, of the court of ordinary. The deed of the administrator of Melton to the plaintiff, conveying the other lot of land, was dated September 28, 1906, under an order of the ordinary granted at the September term, 1906, of the court of ordinary. There was in evidence a deed to the two lots of land from Sharpe to Lydia Stone, dated April 10, 1905, and a deed from the latter to the defendants, conveying the two lots of land, dated May 19, 1905. The only oral testimony upon the trial of the case was that of Gordon Stone, whose testimony in full was as follows:

"I am acquainted with lots Nos. 5 and 6 in the Second district of Charlton county. I know the defendants in this case. Medlin & Sundy [defendants] boxed and worked these lots for turpentine purposes. They boxed and worked them in 1906, and I believe they went right on until 1907. Either that, or they boxed them in 1905 and continued to work them until 1906. They worked these boxes until they were stopped from so doing by a bill of injunction. They worked the turpentine on these lots until they were stopped by an injunction. Medlin & Sundy cut the boxes and cornered them and chipped them and dipped them until they were stopped. This paper, purporting to be a deed from Lydia A. Stone to Medlin & Sundy, is the deed under which Medlin & Sundy claim these lots. I suppose that on the two lots Medlin & Sundy had cut 6,000 or 8,000 boxes. They did not box all of either lot, but boxed about one-half of the timber on each lot, or rather between one-third and one-half of the timber. Most of the timber that they boxed was on the west side of the lot. This did not adjoin their other turpentine operations. It was about a mile from their other turpentine operations, which were over towards Mr. Mose Crews. There were no swamps dividing the lots, but these lots lie in the Little Okefenokee Swamp. The reason why they did not box the other was because the swamp was too bad. Medlin & Sundy cut and worked about 5,000 or 6,000 boxes. Lydia A. Stone, referred to in this deed, is my wife. Medlin & Sundy commenced boxing lots 5 and 6 in the Second district of Charlton county under this deed, dated May 19, 1905, either in the year 1905 or 1906. I do not know definitely when they began their operation, as I was not interested in that business. They did not box the timber in 1906 though, for they worked it in 1906. They were not back-boxing timber but were cutting round timber. Some of the timber had been boxed before this round timber that they boxed. I will not be positive as to the date as to when they commenced working these lots, but I am certain that they worked the turpentine in 1906. They cut something like 6,000 or 8,000 boxes on lot No. 5. I do not know how much on each they cut, but the two lots lay broadside of one another. There were two islands that they boxed. They boxed Gallberry Island, but the rest of the swamp was so bad that they could not get to work it. They boxed and worked about one-third or one-half of each lot. They just worked the new boxes in 1906 that they had already cut. It might have been that they had some more boxes that they worked lower down, but I do not know about that. I do not know exactly when in 1906 they started to work the new boxes. I do know, however, that they worked them in 1906. Replying to your question as to how continuously they worked them, I will say that they worked them regularly. They chipped them once a week, and dipped them regularly. This work was done around the swamp or bay or on the islands. I know the lines of these lots, for I helped Mr. Cooper run them out. Replying to your question as to how I know that they worked these boxes in 1906, I will say that I was not there when they commenced working them, but I was there during the season, and they worked them pretty regularly. I made several trips over there. The first time I went over there they were working them. They had the boxes cut when we ran the lines. I do not remember exactly when it was that we ran the lines, but Mr. Cooper can tell you the dates."

This testimony was not such as to require a finding that the defendants boxed or worked the trees for turpentine purposes until the year 1906, in which the plaintiff obtained the deeds of the administrators. The defendants boxed the trees for turpentine purposes "in 1905 or 1906," and "worked them for such purposes the year succeeding the one in which they boxed them." If they did not box the trees until 1906, as far as disclosed by the evidence, such boxing may have been done in that year after the deeds of the administrators were made to the plaintiff. The private sales of the land by the administrators were void if they were not "wild, uncultivated lands" at the time of the sale, as administrators have no right to sell at private sale any lands of the estate they represent except "wild, uncultivated lands." The lands would not be "wild, uncultivated lands" if they were in the adverse possession of the defendants. If, when the private sales of the administrators were made, the lands were in the adverse possession of the defendants, the sales would be void, as the land would not be "wild, uncultivated lands." The lands might not be in the adverse possession of the defendants, and yet not be "wild, uncultivated lands." If the lands at the time of the sale were not in the adverse possession of the defendants, the sales would be void if they were not "wild, uncultivated lands." As land in the adverse possession of any one cannot be wild land, the only question involved is whether or not, under the evidence, the lands were "wild, uncultivated lands" at the time of the private sales by the administrators. This question was one for the jury, and the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendants.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by the Bainbridge State Bank against Gordon L. Boyett. By amendment of petition Jessie R. Williams was made plaintiff for use of the Bainbridge State Bank. From an order granting a new trial after verdict for defendant, he brings error. Affirmed.

W. H. Krause, for plaintiff in error. Jno. R. Wilson and Hawes & Pottle, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. [1] 1. Under Civ. Code 1910, § 6183, the Supreme Court will not dismiss a writ of error, "where there is enough in the bill of exceptions or transcript of the record presented, or both together, to enable the court to ascertain substantially the real questions in the case which the parties seek to have decided therein." Therefore a bill of exceptions contains enough to enable this court to ascertain the point adjudicated by the trial court and sought to be reviewed, where it appears from the bill of exceptions that "the cause of the Bainbridge State Bank against Gordon L. Boyett" was tried at a given term of a superior court; that a verdict was rendered there in favor of the defendant; that "at the same * * * term of the court a motion for a new trial in said cause of the Bainbridge State Bank against Gordon L. Boyett was filed by one Jessie R. Williams for the use of said bank," and, when said motion came on for a hearing, "the respondent Gordon L. Boyett duly filed his motion to dismiss said motion for a new trial, upon the grounds that no party to the cause had filed any motion for a new trial in said cause, which motion to dismiss is specified as a part of the record, and which motion was by the court on said date overruled, to which ruling and judgment, which would be a final adjudication, said respondent excepted and now excepts and assigns same as error," and that "the court granted a new trial in the cause of the Bainbridge State Bank against Gordon L. Boyett, to which ruling and judgment of the court respondent excepted and now excepts and assigns same as error." The motion to dismiss the writ of error must therefore be denied. Patterson v. Beck, 133 Ga. 701, 66 S. E. 911.

[2] 2. In an equitable action brought by the Bainbridge State Bank against Gordon L. Boyett, the petition alleged: The plaintiff is the bona fide owner of a promissory note executed by the defendant and payable to the order of Jessie R. Williams. The note was given for part of the purchase money of described realty sold by Williams to the defendant, and for which Williams had given the defendant a bond for title. The note contained a waiver of homestead and exemption. The defendant had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and certain described property, including the realty for part of the purchase money of which the note was given, had been set apart as a homestead and exemption by the trustee in bankruptcy to the defendant, who is now in possession of the same. The note was not proved in the court of bankruptcy, nor did the plaintiff appear in the bankruptcy proceedings. The defendant has never been discharged in bankruptcy, and a judgment in rem is prayed against such exempted party. The petition was directed to the city court of Bainbridge, Decatur county, and was marked, "Filed in office April 20, 1909," signed by "C. W. Wimberly, Clerk." An amendment to the petition was marked, "Filed in office April 21, 1909," signed by "C. W. Wimberly, Clerk." The act creating the city court of Bainbridge provided that the clerk of the superior court of Decatur county should be ex officio clerk of the city court of Bainbridge. In the amendment to the petition the cause was stated as, "Jessie R. Williams for use of Bainbridge State Bank v. Gordon L. Boyett, Complainant. Superior Court Decatur County, May Term, 1909." The amendment sought to change the address of the petition from the city court of Bainbridge to the superior court of Decatur county. Process was issued from the superior court of Decatur county, and was served upon the defendant. On May 15, 1909, the defendant filed in the superior court of Decatur county a motion to dismiss the cause, upon the ground that the petition was addressed to the city court of Bainbridge, and that the superior court therefore had no jurisdiction of the cause. This motion was headed, "Georgia, Decatur County. Jessie R. Williams for use of Bainbridge State Bank v. Gordon L. Boyett. In Superior Court said county. May term, 1909. Bill in Equity." On the last-named date the defendant also filed in such superior court a plea in which the cause was stated as in his motion to dismiss. The amendment to the petition was allowed upon the trial at the November term, 1909, of the superior court. There was a verdict in favor of the defendant. A motion for a new trial was made in the name of "Jessie R. Williams for use of Bainbridge State Bank." Upon the hearing of the motion the respondent, Boyett, moved to dismiss the same, upon the ground that the action was brought by the Bainbridge State Bank, and no amendment had been allowed providing that the cause proceed in the name of Jessie R. Williams for the use of the Bainbridge State Bank, and therefore that no motion for a new trial had been made in the name of any party to the cause. The court overruled this motion, and Boyett excepted.

[4] Under the facts stated, we are of the opinion that the ruling of the court in refusing to dismiss the motion for a new trial should not be reversed. In the amendment to the petition, as well as in the defendant's motion to dismiss the case, and in his plea, the case was stated as in the name of Jessie R. Williams for the use of the Bainbridge State Bank against the defendant. Both parties in all the pleadings, except the original petition, having stated the cause as being in the name of Jessie R. Williams for the use of the Bainbridge State Bank, and it having been finally tried as a cause of that character, the defendant, after having obtained a verdict and judgment, should not be allowed to subsequently urge the point that Jessie R. Williams was not a party to the cause, especially in view of the fact that she was a mere nominal party, and that the Bainbridge State Bank in whose name the action was originally brought was the party at interest in the cause, and in the motion for a new trial made therein. In this connection, see Anderson v. Foster, 105 Ga. 563, 565, 32 S. E. 373; Gate City Terminal Co. v. Thrower, 136 Ga. 456, 71 S. E. 903.

[3] 3. Error is assigned in the bill of exceptions upon the grant of a new trial. From an examination of the record it appears that a verdict in favor of the defendant, Boyett, was not demanded under the law and the evidence. It follows that the discretion of the trial judge in granting the first new trial will not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Clifford E. Ray, Thomas J. Ray, and J. L. Watson, as guardian for Bolivar H. Ray, Jr., and Lucile, Ruth, Marvin, and George Ray, minors, filed their petition against the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company and Bolivar H. Ray, Sr. The substance of the petition as amended, and now material, was as follows: The minors, represented by Watson, and the other two plaintiffs, are all the children of Bolivar H. Ray, Sr., and his wife, Carrie I. Ray, who died in 1893. On August 1, 1893, the defendant Ray, as trustee for his wife and their minor children, bought from Mrs. Shellman a described house and lot at the price of $5,400, all of which he paid except $1,800. Mrs. Shellman subsequently sued Ray, as trustee, for the balance of the unpaid purchase money due for the property, obtained judgment, and had the property sold at sheriff's sale. Ray, as trustee, arranged with Plant that the latter should bid in the property at the sheriff's sale for the benefit of Ray, as trustee; Plant agreeing to convey the property to Ray, as trustee, upon the payment by him to Plant of the amount of the latter's bid. On July 26, 1897, Plant conveyed the property by quitclaim deed to Ray, as trustee for his wife, and, at her death, then in trust for her children. In the language of this deed Ray, as such trustee, was given "full power and authority to sell, mortgage, or otherwise incur all or any part of said property at his discretion, either publicly or privately, and on such terms as the trustee may prefer, and without the necessity of any order of court therefor." In order to obtain the money with which to pay off Plant's bid for the property, Ray, as trustee, borrowed from Mrs. Roush $2,400, and to secure the payment of this loan he, as trustee, on July 26, 1897, executed to Mrs. Roush a security deed to the property.

On April 22, 1898, Ray borrowed $2,500 from the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company for the purpose of paying his individual indebtedness, and on the same date executed to this company a "second mortgage" on the property to secure the loan. The negotiation for this loan was had between Ray and Cabaniss, who was at the time president both of the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company and of the Exchange Bank of Macon; and it was then agreed between Cabaniss, as president of the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, and Ray, as trustee, that the loan should be made by this company to Ray, as trustee, and that it should be secured by a mortgage upon the property in question, to be executed by Ray, as trustee, to the company, and that when the transaction should be completed Ray should deposit the money so loaned in the Exchange Bank of Macon to meet certain of his individual debts, with which the trust estate had no connection. In the language of the petition: "Both the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company and the Exchange Bank of Macon, Ga., had a business and financial interest in the individual obligation of said Ray which are herein referred to, and in the payment of said obligation $1,050 of that sum was directly due by said Ray to the Exchange Bank of Macon, Ga., and the other sums, which along with the $1,050 made up the total of $2,500, were due and owing to certain regular customers of the Exchange Bank of Macon, Ga., and the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company. The said B. H. Ray was not, either individually or as trustee, permitted to handle the $2,500 so borrowed; but the same was by the said J. W. Cabaniss applied to the individual obligation of B. H. Ray to said banks and to the customers of said banks. By reason whereof petitioners allege that the said J. W. Cabaniss, as president of the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, did aid and assist the said B. H. Ray, as trustee aforesaid, with full knowledge of the misconduct of the said B. H. Ray, as trustee, etc., in misapplying the assets of his trust estate, which was intended and should have been used for the benefit of petitioners."

On December 6, 1898, Mrs. Roush, by virtue of the power of sale contained in the security deed executed to her by Ray, as trustee, advertised and sold the property in question, and, in the language of the petition, "the said Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, by agreement with the said B. H. Ray, trustee, bid off said property at said sale for the benefit of the trust estate, taking thereto a deed from the said Kate M. Roush, paying her the sum of $2,669.93, being the balance of the purchase money due and owing by the said trustee for said property." This agreement was in parol, and was made by the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, through its president, Cabaniss; it being part of the agreement so made with such company to purchase the property for the protection of the trust estate, and that it might be redeemed within a reasonable time by the trustee for such estate. In the language of the petition: "By reason of the parol agreement * * * the said Union Savings Bank & Trust Company had no competitors at said sale, and the said trustee did not make any effort to obtain competitive bids for said property, or to make said property bring at said sale its full value, which petitioners allege was, at all the times mentioned in the petition, worth $5,000 or more, and would have brought the sum of $5,000 at forced sale." It was further alleged that "by reason of the fact that Cabaniss, as president of the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, had induced Ray, as trustee, to give that company the second mortgage on the trust property, the trustee was unable to arrange a sale of the property so as to realize a surplus above the amount due Mrs. Roush, or to borrow money with which to pay it."

On March 8, 1899, the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company and the defendant Ray, "conspiring together to defraud said trust estate, entered into an agreement by which the said Union Savings Bank & Trust Company was to take, hold, and use said trust property as its own, at and for the agreed price of $5,000, the payment of which consisted in the Roush debt, including interest and expenses, the sum of $2,759.65, leaving a balance of $2,240.35, which was appropriated as a credit upon said debts held by the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company against said Ray as trustee, for the said sum of $2,500, made on April 22, 1898, as hereinbefore described, and leaving a balance still outstanding upon said debt of $468.56, for which amount the Exchange Bank of Macon took the individual note of the said B. H. Ray, on March 10, 1899, and thereupon canceled and surrendered the said note for $2,500, dated April 22, 1898, payable to the said Union Savings Bank & Trust Company and signed by said B. H. Ray, trustee for his wife and children." It was alleged that the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, in order to further cover up the fraudulent scheme to deprive petitioners of their rights in the property in question, had sold and conveyed the same to an innocent purchaser; that at the date of filing the petition the eldest of the petitioners was 22 years old, and that the petitioners, "by the fraud of the defendants, and by reason of defendants' conduct as herein described, and by reason of their tender age, were prevented from knowing of their rights in the premises, and of the fraudulent conduct of the defendants, until at least one of them reached the age of maturity." There was a prayer for the recovery of the sum of $2,240.35, which was alleged to be "a trust fund in the hands of the said Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, with full knowledge that the same belonged to petitioners, and which the said bank undertook to aid the said trustee in misappropriating, by using the same in the settlement of the individual debts of the said trustee, and thereby defeat the petitioner's rights to the same."

The petition was demurred to by the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company upon the following grounds: (1) Because it sets forth no cause of action against this defendant; (2) because the purpose of the petition is to ingraft upon the property described therein a trust in favor of the plaintiffs, and the allegations are not sufficient either to create an express trust or to raise an implied trust; (3) because the petition seeks to ingraft an express trust upon a written deed by parol, and there can be no parol trust in land, and no express trust can be created by parol; (4) that, from the allegations of the petition, the land therein described was not purchased with any money belonging to the petitioners, and it appears that they have parted with nothing which they ever possessed or owned; (5) that the agreement set forth in the petition concerned an interest in and the sale of land, and was within the statute of frauds, and should therefore have been in writing; (6) that the alleged verbal agreement having been made in the year 1899, and suit entered thereon in 1909, ten years thereafter, the trustee was barred, and the cestuis que trustent are also barred; (7) because under the allegations of the petition the right of action, if any exists, is in B. H. Ray, as trustee for his wife and children, and not the petitioners. The court sustained the general demurrer, and dismissed the case, to which ruling the plaintiffs excepted.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). "All persons aiding and assisting trustees of any character, with a knowledge of their misconduct, in misapplying assets, are directly accountable to the persons injured." Civil Code 1895, § 3200 (Civil Code 1910, § 3784). "One who purchases from a trustee who has authority to sell acquires a title to the property sold; and the title thus acquired is not affected by the subsequent conduct of the purchaser in knowingly aiding the trustee in a misappropriation of the proceeds of the sale, unless such misappropriation be the result of an arrangement between the purchaser and the trustee before the sale is completed, or the purchaser know that the trustee is selling for the purpose of misappropriating the proceeds. A purchaser who buys in good faith from a trustee, and subsequently aids the trustee in misappropriating the purchase money, is liable to the persons injured by the misappropriation; but such conduct does not invalidate his title to the property acquired under the sale by the trustee." Tapley v. Tapley, 115 Ga. 109, 41 S. E. 235. It is contended for the beneficiaries under the trust deed from Plant to Ray, as trustee, whom we will designate as the plaintiffs, that, applying the provisions of the Code section above quoted and the ruling in the case cited to the facts alleged in the petition, a cause of action was set forth against both of the defendants. The trustee, under the power given him in the deed from Plant to sell or incur the trust property in his discretion without an order of court, was not authorized to execute the mortgage on the trust property to secure the payment of the loan made by the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company to the trustee in accordance with the agreement between the company and the trustee that the money so loaned should be deposited in another bank and paid out in the satisfaction of the individual indebtedness of Ray, who was trustee, due the bank last referred to and to other creditors of Ray, who were customers of such bank and the defendant company. See Maynard v. Cleveland, 76 Ga. 52 (4); Cohen v. Parish, 105 Ga. 339 (2) 345, 31 S. E. 205. The conduct of the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company in respect to this transaction was certainly an effort on its part to aid and assist the trustee in the misapplication of the trust property, not only with full knowledge of his misconduct, but in compliance with an express agreement with the trustee that the company should actually take part in the misapplication. Therefore, if the action of the company as to this matter eventuated in injury to the plaintiffs, the company is directly accountable to them for it.

We do not perceive, however, any resultant injury to the plaintiffs from this transaction alone. The possession and ownership of the note, given by the trustee to the company for the loan which was mutually agreed should be used in the payment of his individual indebtedness, and which was so applied, as well as that of the mortgage executed by the trustee to the company to secure the payment of such note, were retained by the company, and no effort was ever made to subject the trust property to satisfy the same. The note and mortgage in the hands of the company were invalid as against the trust estate, and the mere giving of the same, in the circumstances, to the company by the trustee, without more, did not cause any injury to the plaintiffs. But it is alleged in the petition that "by reason of the fact that Cabaniss, as president of the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, had induced Ray, as trustee, to give that company the second mortgage on the trust property, the trustee was unable to arrange a sale of the property so as to realize a surplus above the amount due Mrs. Roush, or to borrow money with which to pay it." In the absence of an averment that the trustee made an effort to sell the property, or to borrow money for such purpose, which was unavailing by reason of the fact that the mortgage had been given, the allegation quoted above amounts to no more than the conclusion of the pleader that the effect of the execution of the mortgage was necessarily to prevent the trustee from selling the property or borrowing money for the purpose indicated. We do not think that such result necessarily followed; but, even if it did, we do not perceive how the trust estate was injured merely because the trustee, by reason of the execution of the mortgage, was unable to arrange a sale of the property so as to realize a surplus above the Roush debt or to borrow money with which to pay it. If these were the only results of the giving of the mortgage, if the matter ended here, no damage to the trust estate appears. Ray's individual debts were paid with the money loaned him by the company for that purpose, and he, as trustee, gave the company a mortgage on the trust property to secure the loan; but by this transaction alone the company did not get any of the property belonging to the trust estate, nor was any of the trust property misapplied to the injury of the trust estate. The money so borrowed was Ray's individual money, and it was appropriated to the payment of his individual indebtedness.

Nor do we think that the defendant company was bound for aiding and assisting the trustee in the misapplication of the property of the trust estate, nor that it injured the plaintiffs, the beneficiaries of such estate, by purchasing the property at the sale made by Mrs. Roush, under the power given her in the security deed executed by the trustee. As one who purchases in good faith from a trustee who has authority to sell acquires the title to the property sold, it must follow that, where a trustee is authorized to incumber property by executing a deed thereto for the purpose of securing a loan with which to discharge a prior incumbrance on the property, a sale duly made by the grantee, upon whom such power was conferred in the security deed, was legal, and the purchaser under such sale acquired title to the property sold, in the absence of fraud on his part. The defendant company was not charged with any fraud in purchasing the property under the Roush sale, it being merely alleged that under a parol agreement between the trustee and the company the latter purchased the property for the benefit of the trust estate—that is, that the company agreed in parol to purchase the property for the protection of the trust estate, and that it might be redeemed within a reasonable time by the trustee; that the company purchased the property at the sale for $2,669.96, being the balance of the purchase money due Mrs. Roush for the property by the trustee, and took a deed from her to the property, which was then worth $5,000. There is no allegation that this agreement between the trustee and the company was collusive, and made for the purpose of misapplying the property of the trust estate, or in any way injuring the cestuis que trustent. In fact there was no misapplication of the proceeds of the sale, for they went to pay the debt due by the trust estate to Mrs. Roush. There was no averment of any offer by the trustee to redeem, and, even if there had been, the company was not legally bound to comply with its oral agreement to allow the trustee to redeem the land, or to reconvey it to him upon the payment of the amount the company had paid for it at the sale, as the contract was for the sale of, or concerning, land. Civil Code 1895, § 2693 (4); Civil Code 1910, § 3222 (4); Lyons v. Bass, 108 Ga. 573, 34 S. E. 721. The defendant got a legal title to the land under the sale. The proceeds of the sale were not misapplied, and the company was not legally bound to reconvey the property to the trustee. This being true, we do not perceive how the company, in the absence of any fraud in the transaction, can be made liable, on the theory of aiding and assisting the trustee in the misapplication of trust funds, for the difference between the real value of the land at the time of the sale and the amount at which it was bid off.

Was a cause of action set forth by the allegations that, after the defendant company had purchased the land at the Roush sale in December, 1898, in March of the succeeding year the company and the trustee conspired together to defraud the trust estate, by entering into an agreement by which the company "was to take, hold, and use said trust property as its own, at and for the agreed price of $5,000, the payment of which consisted in the Roush debt, including interest and expenses, the sum of $2,759.65, leaving a balance of $2,240.35, which was appropriated as a credit upon" the note of $2,500, which had been given by Ray, as trustee, on April 22, 1898, for the loan with which to pay his individual debts, and the giving to the Exchange Bank of Macon, by Ray, the trustee, of his individual note for the balance, viz., $468.50 which agreement was carried out, and a subsequent sale of the property made by the company to an innocent purchaser? As we have seen, the bank had a legal title to the property, and therefore could dispose of it as it pleased. There was no allegation that the agreement last referred to constituted any part of the agreement between the trustee and the company that the latter should purchase the property at the Roush sale, nor is there anything in the petition tending to show that the trustee and the company intended, at the time of such sale, that this last agreement would be entered into. As we have said, the legal title to the property was in the company, and it could have sold and conveyed it to any one without allowing any credit on the note given by Ray, as trustee, for the loan with which to discharge his individual debts. The allowing of the credit on such note was, therefore, a mere gratuity on the part of the company.

Our conclusion is that there was nothing in this last transaction which constituted a misapplication by the bank of the trust property, nor anything showing that the company aided or assisted the trustee in the misapplication of trust funds or property. There was nothing in the petition going to show that the three transactions therein set forth, and which we have discussed, constituted a scheme between the trustee and the defendant company to defraud the trust estate; but it appeared, so far as the petition showed to the contrary, that such transactions were separate and distinct. Nor was the property of such estate thereby misapplied by the trustee, with the aid or assistance of the defendant company, and to the injury of the plaintiffs. It follows, therefore, that the petition did not set forth a cause of action and that it was properly dismissed on general demurrer.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS (§ 88*)—EVIDENCE (§§ 271, 353*)—DEED DISTINGUISHED FROM WILL—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

J. F. Pruett died on May 12, 1909, leaving a widow and several children by a former marriage. The widow sought to have dower assigned out of certain land, which the children resisted on the ground that the property had been conveyed to them by Pruett before his death. The instrument relied on as a conveyance of the property was dated August 21, 1908, but was not recorded until after the death of Pruett. It was in the form of a warranty deed, and recited, among other things, that the former wife of the grantor and the mother of the grantees in the deed in 1897 inherited from her father $940, of which amount $754 was invested by the grantor, with the consent of his then wife, in the land described in the deed, such sum being the full purchase price of the land; that by oversight, neglect, or ignorance of the difference that would be made, title to the land was taken in the name of the grantor in the present deed, instead of the name of his then wife, thus placing the legal title in such grantor, but leaving the equitable title in his wife, which had remained in her ever since; that she died in April, 1902, intestate, and no administration has ever been had upon her estate; and that, as the grantor desired that the legal as well as the equitable title to the land should be placed in the heirs at law of his first wife, in order that full justice and equity should be done, "and in consideration of the facts herein set forth, as well as for the natural love and affection I hold for my said children hereinbefore named, and also for the consideration that I am to remain in possession of said lands and receive the benefits therefrom as long as I live," the grantor conveyed unto the grantees all interest in the land, including his own interest as an heir at law of his first wife. Upon the introduction of the instrument objection was urged to its admissibility on the grounds: "(a) Because the said deed appears to have been recorded since the death of the grantor; and, further, it is a testamentary paper purely and not a deed. (b) The recitals contained in said deed are not binding upon the widow, and should not be allowed to go to the jury for the purpose of defeating the widow in her dower rights, and as to her passed no title to the grantees. (c) Upon the further ground that the said deed, as insisted by the widow, is without consideration; the objectionable recitals being eliminated from the consideration of the court and jury. (d) Because it appears upon the face of said deed that the recitals in it contained is but an effort by the grantor to perpetuate his testimony as to his own knowledge as to whose property was sought to be conveyed, and to whom it had or should have belonged, and to whom it should go. (e) Because the recitals in said deed are self-serving declarations, made in contemplation of early death and possible or probable litigation afterwards, and therefore inadmissible." Held, the instrument conveyed an estate in praesenti, with possession postponed until after the death of the grantor, and was not testamentary in character. Isler v. Griffin, 134 Ga. 192, 67 S. E. 854. The other grounds of objection urged to its admissibility were without merit.

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—ASSIGNMENT OF DOWER.

The evidence introduced upon the trial was insufficient, under any view, to authorize a finding that the land was the property of J. F. Pruett at the time of his death, and there was no error in granting a verdict against the applicant for dower.

SELPH et al. v. SELPH et al.

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EVIDENCE (§ 340*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—AUTHENTICATION.

This case was here on a former occasion. Selph v. Selph, 133 Ga. 406, 65 S. E. 881. After the decision in the Supreme Court, and before the termination of the case in the superior court, the defendants filed an application to the court of ordinary to establish a copy of the lost original return of the appraisers setting apart the land to the defendants as a year's support. The petition to establish the lost paper was not served upon the plaintiffs in the pending suit, nor did they have notice of the application; but the ordinary, on the day the application was presented, entered an order ex parte establishing the copy in lieu of the lost original. On a subsequent trial of the case in the superior court, when the copy so established was offered in evidence, it was admitted over the objection, among others, that the order establishing the lost record was passed without any notice to the plaintiffs, as required by law. Under the rulings in the cases of Cleghorn v. Johnson, 69 Ga. 369, Wimberly v. Mansfield, 70 Ga. 783, Cosnahan v. Rowland, 89 Ga. 285, 25 S. E. 647, and Allen v. Lindsey, 113 Ga. 521, 38 S. E. 975, this was error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PRESCRIPTIVE TITLE.

The case was submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury, and the defendants in error relied both upon record title and upon prescription. The evidence is not sufficient to require a finding in favor of the prescriptive title. Civil Code, 1910, § 3725.

APPLING v. CITY OF ABBEVILLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 22, 1911.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 868*)—SCHOOL TAXES—LIMITATION OF AMOUNT.

The act approved December 3, 1895 (Acts 1895, p. 117), establishing a system of public schools for the city of Abbeville, to be supported and maintained by funds derived from the levy of a municipal tax not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent., and from the town's proportionate share of the state public school fund, under the administration of a board of education, contemplates that all liabilities legally created by the board of education are payable exclusively from the designated funds. Where the maximum tax in a given year was collected and paid over by the town authorities to the board of education, who had disbursed the same, the municipality was not liable to a school-teacher for the unpaid balance of his salary under a verbal contract made with the board for services rendered during the year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 868.*]

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Action by R. Appling against the City of Abbeville. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hal Lawson, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Cannon, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The plaintiff sued the city of Abbeville on an account for services rendered as a school-teacher under a contract with the board of education, who were alleged to have authority to bind the city in making the contract. The defendant denied liability. The case was tried before the judge on an agreed statement of facts, the salient parts of which are as follows: The plaintiff made a verbal contract to teach school, during the year 1901, with the board of education, organized under the act of 1895, establishing a system of public schools in the city of Abbeville. He performed the services stipulated in the contract, for which he had been partially paid, leaving as due the amount sued for. At the time of making the contract the board of education had no funds on hand, and the money for the payment of plaintiff had to be derived from the funds to be paid over to the board of education by the mayor and council of Abbeville from taxes collected for the years 1901 and 1902. For these years the mayor and council had levied and collected a tax of one-half of 1 per cent. for school purposes, and had paid the same to the board of education, and the funds had been disbursed by the board prior to the filing of the plaintiff's suit, and the board had no funds on hand. The court adjudged that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and he excepts.

The act approved December 3, 1895 (Acts 1895, p. 117), provided for the establishment of a system of public schools for the city of Abbeville under the supervision of a board of education, consisting of five citizens elected by the mayor and council. The board of education was authorized to employ teachers and fix their compensation. The mayor and council were empowered to annually levy and collect such tax (not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent.) as would be sufficient, when added to the sums received from the public school fund of the state, to support and maintain the city schools for at least six scholastic months in each year, and they were directed to pay the fund raised by the tax to the board of education, to be disbursed by the board for the support and maintenance of the schools. The clear import of the act was that the expenses of maintaining the city schools were to be defrayed exclusively from a fund produced by revenue from two sources, viz., that accruing from the town's levy of a special tax, and the town's proportionate part of the state public school fund. The board of education had no authority to create any debt against the city. Their power to contract carried with it the limitation that the liabilities which they might create were payable only from the funds appropriated to the support of the schools. If the city failed to levy and pay the tax to the board, it could be compelled by mandamus so to do. Dennington v. Roberts, 130 Ga. 494, 61 S. E. 20. The city did collect and pay over the full tax authorized to be levied, and it is not liable to a school-teacher who failed to get his money from the board of education.

NEW TRIAL (§ 154*)—PROCEEDING TO PROCURE—MOTION TO DISMISS MOTION—RENEWAL.

Where the presiding judge passes an order overruling a motion to dismiss a motion for a new trial, made by the respondent at a time when the judge had jurisdiction to pass on such motion to dismiss, and providing that the movant have until a named date, which is the first day of the next term, to present for approval a brief of the evidence, and the movant duly files and presents for approval such brief on that day, while the order overruling the motion to dismiss stands unreversed, the judge during such term or thereafter is without authority to dismiss the motion for new trial on another motion of the respondent based on the same grounds on which the former motion was made; such grounds being that movant in the motion for new trial had not presented for approval a brief of the evidence within the time specified in orders of the judge passed before the order overruling the motion to dismiss.

Hatcher & Hatcher, for plaintiff in error.
O. E. Battle and Howell Hollis, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff in error sued the defendant in error, and during the May term, 1910, of the superior court a verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of the defendant. During that term, and within 30 days from the rendition of the verdict, the plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, the grounds of which were approved; and during the same term, on May 23, 1910, an order was passed by the court, directing that the motion be heard on August 1, 1910. This order further provided that, if the motion was not heard on that date, it should be heard at such "time and place in vacation as counsel may agree upon, under approval of the court, and, upon failure to agree, then at such time and place as presiding judge may fix on the application of either party, upon five days' notice to the opposite party, and that "movant have until 23d of July, 1910, to prepare and present for approval and filing a brief of the evidence." On July 23, 1910, in vacation, the presiding judge passed an order providing "that the time for preparing and presenting to the court her [movant's] brief of the evidence for approval be extended until the 1st day of August, 1910, at which time the court will approve the brief of evidence, * * * and the same may then be filed." On August 1, 1910, during the August term of the court, the presiding judge passed an order reciting "that the plaintiff's counsel are not guilty of laches" in failing to present for approval a brief of the evidence, and ordering that the hearing of the motion "be continued until the 29th of August, 1910, and that plaintiff have until the 26th day of August, 1910, to prepare and present to the court her brief of evidence in the case for approval and filing, at which time said motion for new trial is set for hearing at chambers in Muscogee county, Ga." On August 29, 1910, in vacation, the presiding judge granted an order providing that the hearing of the motion be continued until the 27th day of September, 1910, "and that movant have until said hearing to prepare and present to the court for his approval and filing a brief of the evidence in said cause." This order recited that it was granted "without prejudice to either party." On September 27, 1910, in vacation, the judge granted an order reciting that on August 29, 1910, the respondent made a motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial, "upon the ground that no brief of evidence had been presented for approval by the court, and other grounds, as will appear by motion of that date, this motion was overruled, and further time was granted movant to prepare and file his brief of evidence." This order further recited: "On the 27th day of September, 1910, on the call of said case, counsel for the defendant appeared and announced to the court that the appearance for defendant was subject to a prior motion to dismiss, and to offer a motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial. This motion was also overruled, and movant granted until the 7th day of November, 1910, to complete and present for approval her brief of evidence, on which date said motion shall be heard and determined." During the November term of the court, the plaintiff filed in the clerk's office, and presented to the judge for approval, on November 7, 1910, a brief of the evidence. The motion "stood on the motion docket of said court, until the regular call of the motion docket during said November term, 1910, of said court, when it was called in its regular order for trial on the 30th day of November, 1910," at which time the court approved and ordered filed the brief of evidence and an amendment to the motion for a new trial. On November 30, 1910, while the November term of the court was in session, the motion for a new trial was called in its regular order on the motion docket, and respondent orally moved to dismiss the same, "because the brief of the evidence had not been approved by the court in terms of the orders passed in the cause." The court reserved his decision until December 8, 1910, when he rendered a judgment dismissing the motion for a new trial, which judgment contained, among other recitals, the following: "While this court feels assured that no error of law was committed, and counsel for movant having several times, on the various hearings, admitted that the evidence was sufficient to authorize the verdict rendered, yet, because the reasons which prevented the completion and filing of the brief of evidence appealed strongly to the court and seemed sufficient to excuse the failure, this court felt anxious to have the Supreme Court pass upon the important issues of law involved. Since the entire record has been submitted, the court is now convinced that it was without jurisdiction to pass any of the orders subsequent to the order dated May 23, 1910. Blackburn v. Alabama Midland Railroad Co., 118 Ga. 936, 43 S. E. 366. The motion is therefore necessarily, but regretfully, dismissed." To this judgment the movant excepted.

One of the exceptions to the order of the court dismissing the motion for a new trial is "because it appears from the order of the court, bearing date 27th September, 1910, and embodied herein, that the court had previously overruled motions of defendant's counsel to dismiss her motion, and that a new motion to dismiss upon the same grounds could not be entertained by the court on 30th November, 1910." The record discloses that on August 29th, the day on which the motion for a new trial was set to be heard by an order granted in term, the respondent made a motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial, "upon the ground that no brief of evidence had been presented for approval by the court." On September 27th another motion was made to dismiss the motion for a new trial. No brief of evidence had been presented for approval, though the original order granted during the May term provided that the movant should present for approval and filing a brief of the evidence on July 23d, which was prior to the time at which, in the same order, the hearing of the motion for new trial was set, and the order granted August 1st, the time fixed in the original order, provided that the brief of evidence should be presented for approval and filing on August 26th, which was prior to the time fixed in this order of August 1st for the hearing on August 29th. The order of September 27th continued the hearing of the motion for new trial until November 7th, and stated that both of the motions to dismiss the motion for new trial were overruled. Therefore there appears a written order of the court overruling the motions to dismiss the motion for a new trial. During the November term of the court, which was the next term after the passage of the order refusing the motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial, the court was without authority to dismiss the motion for a new trial on the same grounds on which he had passed an order refusing to dismiss it in vacation on the 27th of September. This order of September 27th refusing to dismiss the motion for a new trial, was res adjudicata, and was binding on the court and the parties until set aside. A party "may waive or renounce what the law has established in his favor, when he does not thereby injure others or affect the public interest." Civil Code 1910, § 10. The failure to file a brief of evidence according to the terms of the order of the court was a matter which the respondent could waive; and if on the dates set for the hearing of the motion for a new trial the respondent had waived the right to take advantage of the effect of the failure of the movant to present for approval and filing a brief of the evidence according to the terms of the order, and a brief of evidence had been approved and filed by consent of the respondent, the latter could not afterwards complain that the brief of evidence had not been presented for approval and filing according to the terms of the previous orders. When the respondent made a motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial because of the failure of the movant to present for approval and filing a brief of the evidence according to the terms of the orders, and this motion was overruled, the failure of the respondent to except to the order overruling his motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial would be treated as an acquiescence in the ruling of the court and as a waiver of the right to insist on the effect of such failure on the part of the movant. Obear v. Gray, 73 Ga. 455; Augusta Ry. Co. v. Andrews, 89 Ga. 653, 16 S. E. 203; Associated Press v. United Press, 104 Ga. 51, 53, 54, 29 S. E. 869; Walker v. Neil, 117 Ga. 733, 45 S. E. 387. Having passed an order overruling the respondent's motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial, the court could not, at a term of the court occurring thereafter, dismiss the motion on the same ground on which he had previously passed an order refusing to dismiss it, while such order was outstanding. See authorities cited supra; also Hawkins v. Studdard, 132 Ga. 265 (2), 63 S. E. 852, 131 Am. St. Rep. 190; Sims v. Ga. Ry. & El. Co., 123 Ga. 643, 51 S. E. 573; Middlebrooks v. Middlebrooks, 57 Ga. 193.

Counsel for the respondent [defendant in error] state in their brief that respondent filed exceptions pendente lite to the refusal of the court to sustain their motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial; but the question whether or not the court erred in overruling the motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial is not brought to this court by the respondent by main or cross bill of exceptions, and the question is not before us for consideration. The court in its order dismissing the motion for a new trial states: "The court is now convinced that it was without jurisdiction to pass any of the orders subsequent to the order dated May 23, 1910." Under the record before us, when the court passed the order refusing to dismiss the motion for a new trial, it certainly had jurisdiction to pass on the motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial. Edmonds v. State, 122 Ga. 728, 50 S. E. 936; McCord v. Harden, 69 Ga. 747. On September 27, 1910, an order was passed granting movant until November 7, 1910, to complete and present for approval a brief of the evidence. The bill of exceptions recites that on that day movant filed a brief of evidence in the clerk's office and presented it to the presiding judge. This was during the November term of the court, which was then in session, and the motion stood on the motion docket until the regular call thereof during that term of the court, when it was called in its regular order for hearing on the 30th of November. The court therefore evidently did not dismiss the motion for a new trial because a brief of the evidence was not presented for approval on the 7th of November, but dismissed it because, in his opinion, the failure of the movant to present for approval a brief of the evidence in accordance with orders passed previous to the order of September 27th had deprived the court of jurisdiction to hear the motion for a new trial. Regardless of the question whether the failure of the movant to present for approval a brief of evidence as hereinbefore referred to made it, under the facts, the legal and absolute duty of the court to dismiss, or to refuse to dismiss, the motion for a new trial, or made it a matter of discretion in the court whether or not it would dismiss the motion for new trial, the court unquestionably had a right to pass on the motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial at the time he passed the order refusing such motion to dismiss. Having jurisdiction to pass on the motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial, and having passed an order refusing such motion, the court was without authority, at a term subsequent to the passage of such order, to dismiss the motion for a new trial on the same grounds on which he had previously passed the order refusing such motion.

EDWARDS, Sheriff, v. BOYD OO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 137*)—LIABILITY—ACTION—PLEADING.

In an action on the case against a sheriff for damages resulting from a breach of duty on the part of his deputy by omitting to take the statutory bond in a bail trover suit, seize the property, or commit the defendant to jail, the petition in its declarative part did not expressly allege that plaintiff was the owner of the property involved in the trover suit, or that the property at the time of the institution of the trover suit, or subsequently, was in possession of the defendant; but a copy of the petition in the trover suit, together with the judgment in favor of the plaintiff therein, was attached as an exhibit and made a part of the petition in the suit for damages against the sheriff, and the petition so exhibited contained allegations to the effect that the property was that of the plaintiff, and that the defendant was in possession of it at the time of the institution of the suit. Held that, when taken in connection with the exhibit, the petition against the sheriff was not wanting as to such allegations of ownership by the plaintiff and possession by the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 121*)—LIABILITY—ACTION—PLEADING.

The petition sufficiently alleged a breach of official duty and resulting damages to the plaintiff for which the sheriff would be liable, and was not subject to general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. §§ 219-221; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

3. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 137*)—LIABILITY—ACTION—PLEADING.

It was error to disallow the amendment to the plea, and thereafter to strike the plea of defendant.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 195*)—OBJECTIONS IN LOWER COURT—AMENDMENT OF PLEA.

Where no objection was made to the allowance of an amendment to a plea after the appearance term on the ground that there was no affidavit attached, as required by Civ. Code 1895, § 5057 (Civ. Code 1910, § 5640), as amended by Act Dec. 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 35), the ruling of the trial court in disallowing the amendment cannot be sustained on that ground by the Supreme Court.

Error from Superior Court, Dougherty County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by the Boyd Company against F. G. Edwards, Sheriff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The Boyd Company brought an action for damages against Felix G. Edwards, sheriff of the city court of Albany, on account of the failure of a deputy sheriff to properly execute a bail process which was taken out in connection with a trover suit to recover mules from George Hand Kidd. The defendant filed a demurrer, which was overruled, and he excepted. He also, among other things, set up the following defense: "For want of sufficient information he can neither admit nor deny the third paragraph of said petition; and this defendant says, if the facts were as set out therein, the failure on the part of the said deputy sheriff to seize the property therein mentioned, or arrest the defendant, resulted from the fact that said defendant in said action, to wit, George Hand Kidd, was not at the time of the filing of said suit, or subsequent thereto, in possession of the property sued for in said suit; all the property sued for in said suit having been live stock and having died previous to the filing of said suit. That, when said deputy sheriff served said bail and trover papers on said Kidd, he ascertained the fact that Kidd had possession of none of the property called for in said bail trover proceedings, and also ascertained the fact that the agent of the plaintiff in said bail and trover, a Mr. Bunch, who made the bail affidavit in said proceeding, had ascertained that the statement in said bail affidavit, that said property was in the possession of the defendant in said bail and trover proceedings, was untrue, and said Bunch desired to withdraw said affidavit, and that the same be not considered of force, for the reason that the same was a mistake; and by reason of said fact, and by reason of the acts of the plaintiff in said bail trover proceedings, and its agents and attorneys, the said deputy sheriff was led to believe and did believe that it was not his duty to arrest said defendant in said bail trover proceedings, and he did not arrest him at that time, but said defendant did, under the instructions of the judge of the court in which said bail trover proceedings were brought, give bond in the sum of $600 for the personal appearance of said defendant in said bail trover proceedings, to answer said case. And this defendant says said plaintiff in this case was in no wise hurt or damaged by the failure on the part of said deputy sheriff to seize said property, or to arrest the defendant in said bail trover proceeding; and this suit is an effort now to make this defendant, or the said deputy sheriff's estate, responsible for the failure on the part of said deputy sheriff to make said arrest or seize said property, where the plaintiff could not have possibly recovered effectually in the original suit."

The plaintiff filed demurrers on numerous grounds, covering each of the allegations in paragraph 3. Pending the argument on the demurrers, the defendant moved to amend by "striking out of the third paragraph all of the words following 'none of said property called for in said bail trover proceeding;' and before the words 'and this defendant says plaintiff was in no wise hurt,' and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'And was then and there informed by the agent of the plaintiff in said bail trover proceedings, to wit, M. A. Bunch, who made the bail affidavit in said bail trover proceedings that he, the said Bunch, had ascertained that the statement in said bail affidavit, that said property was in possession of said Kidd, was not true, and he desired to withdraw said affidavit, and that the same be considered of no force, and said agent of the plaintiff then and there directed said deputy sheriff to take no further action under said affidavit; and therefore said sheriff did not arrest said Kidd, but did, under the direction of the judge of said court in which said trover proceedings were pending, take from said Kidd a bond as mentioned in plaintiff's petition, and security in the sum of $600, conditioned for the appearance of said Kidd to answer the judgment of said court in said case, which said bond the said Kidd afterwards complied with, said Kidd having remained in said county for six months after said trover suit was disposed of, and said plaintiff having never attempted to have said Kidd arrested or placed in jail for failure to produce said property; and said defendant says that said Kidd was, at the time of the suing out of said bail trover proceedings, and has been ever since, insolvent, and unable to produce said property sued for therein, and would have been entitled to a discharge without giving bond, even if he had been arrested by said deputy sheriff, and therefore said plaintiff is not injured by said failure to arrest. The said Kidd would not have given bond for the eventual condemnation money, if he had been arrested.'"

The plaintiff objected to the allowance of this amendment, on the ground that the facts therein stated were irrelevant and constituted no element of any defense to the suit, because the judgment which had been rendered for the plaintiff in the trover suit against George Hand Kidd was conclusive upon the sheriff and his deputy, and also because the amendment introduced a new defense, and, further, because the amendment failed to allege the present whereabouts of Kidd, or that he could then be reached by the process of the court. The judge refused to allow the amendment, sustained the demurrer to the third paragraph of the plea, and directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against the sheriff for the amount recovered against Kidd in the trover suit. To each of these rulings the sheriff excepted.

Pope & Bennet, for plaintiff in error. R. J. Bacon and Ben T. Burson, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. The ruling in the first headnote sufficiently deals with the question there decided.

[2] 2. The controlling question on demurrer is as to the sheriff's liability in damages, under the allegations of the petition, on account of the failure on the part of the deputy to take the statutory bond, seize the property, or commit the defendant to jail. Under the provisions of Civil Code 1895, § 4605 (Code 1910, § 5151), the affidavit for bail trover having been appropriately made, it was the duty of the officer serving the petition and process "to take a recognizance payable to the plaintiff or complainant, with good security, in double the amount sworn to, for the forthcoming of such personal property to answer such judgment, execution, or decree as may be rendered in the case." The statute further provides that such security shall be bound for the "payment of the eventual condemnation money, for which judgment may be signed up against the defendant and said security, and execution had thereon without further proceeding." Under this law it was the duty of the officer to take a recognizance from the defendant in accordance with the statute, and his failure to require such recognizance was a breach of his official duty. This section of the Code is to be construed in connection with the two preceding sections; and under its provisions, if the defendant fails to give security, whether the affidavit be made at the commencement of the suit or pending the suit, it is the duty of the officer to seize the property sued for and deliver it to the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney, upon his entering into like recognizance with security; and if the property is not to be found and cannot be seized by the officer, he is required to commit the defendant to jail, to be kept in safe and close custody until the property be produced or until he so enters into bond with good security for the eventual condemnation money. A failure on the part of the officer to seize the property, or, if it cannot be seized, to commit the defendant to jail, is a breach of official duty. For the breach of any of these several duties the officer is liable to the plaintiff for any proximate resulting damage.

According to the allegations of the petition, though the defendant was in possession of the property, the sheriff did not take a recognizance for the eventual condemnation money, nor seize the property, nor commit the defendant to jail, but in lieu thereof took a bond, which was not a statutory bond, for the eventual condemnation money; and though he served the defendant, so that a general judgment might be entered against him for the value of the property, he did not seize the property or arrest the defendant. The plaintiff was enabled to proceed to a verdict and judgment for the value of the property, but in addition to this the property should have been before the court, or a bond for the eventual condemnation money, upon which the plaintiff might summarily, upon obtaining judgment against the defendant, also have entered judgment against the principal and security for the amount of the recovery; and to the end that the property might have been surrendered, or the statutory bond given, it was the plaintiff's right to have had the defendant committed to jail. With regard to all of these matters it was alleged that the officer's delinquency in official duty had made it impossible for the plaintiff to do more than enter a general judgment against the defendant for money. Under these circumstances, nothing further appearing, it could not be said that the plaintiff had not sustained damages at the hands of the sheriff on account of the failure of official duty on the part of his deputy. What has been said follows from applying the statutes hereinbefore cited to the facts of this case, and is borne out by the reasoning in the case of Snell v. Mayo, 62 Ga. 743, and citations.

[3] 3. The statement of facts discloses that the defendant sought to avoid liability on account of the matters set up in the third paragraph of his plea, and more fully stated in an amendment which he offered to make at the trial term, but which was disallowed by the judge. The judge also sustained a demurrer interposed by the plaintiff to the several matters set up by the defendant in paragraph 3 of his plea as matters of defense, thus disposing of all of the defenses relied on. From what has been said in the second division, and the reasoning in Snell v. Mayo, supra, it is clear that there was no error in so ruling with reference to any of the several matters of defense, save only that which set up that Mr. Bunch, who is alleged to be the agent of the plaintiff, ascertained, after the trover suit was filed and the affidavit for bail had been made by him, that the mules which were the subject-matter of the trover suit were dead, and consequently not in possession of the defendant at the filing of the suit, and thereupon informed the deputy sheriff, when the latter went to serve the bail trover process, that the statement contained in the affidavit that the mules were in the possession of the defendant was a mistake, and that he did not desire the bail process executed, and thereby induced the deputy to believe that it was not his duty to attempt further execution of the process and to serve the defendant personally.

The affidavit for bail in the trover suit, which was attached as an exhibit to the petition in the action against the sheriff, stated in broad language that Bunch was the agent of the defendant corporation, and the plea interposed by the sheriff also stated in broad language that Bunch was the agent of the plaintiff corporation. While the grounds of demurrer filed by the plaintiff to the several portions of paragraph 3 were numerous, none of them called for more specific allegations as to the extent of the agency. It will be assumed that his authority was sufficiently broad to authorize him to give the sheriff direction touching the manner of executing the bail trover process. The plaintiff was a corporation, which could only act through an agent, and, according to the plea and the recitals of the affidavit for bail, he was the agent of the corporation. After the discovery of the mistake in the recital contained in the affidavit for bail, it was in the interest of the plaintiff, as well as due to the affiant and to the defendant and the officer, that the agent call attention to it in such manner as would prevent execution of the bail process. To say otherwise would be to hold that this harsh remedy should be enforced when in fact there was no ground upon which it could be invoked. The law is not to be so administered. According to the allegations of the plea as amended, the conduct of the agent was in effect a dismissal of the bail feature of the trover action, and the sheriff ought not to be held liable for damages resulting from failure to seize the property or to commit the defendant to jail in lieu of his giving bond for the eventual condemnation money. If the action of the agent was a dismissal, the officer was under no duty to render any service involved in the dismissed part of the action. It was entirely out of the case. In this connection see Holcombe v. Dupree, 50 Ga. 335; Groover v. White, 54 Ga. 601; 35 Cyc. 1616; State v. Woods, 7 Mo. 536; Ross v. Cave, 49 Mo. 129.

[4] What has been said deals with the original plea, together with the amendment which was proposed and disallowed. It was insisted in the brief of counsel for defendant in error that the amendment was properly disallowed, because it was offered after the appearance term, and there was no affidavit attached, as required by Civil Code 1895, § 5057 (Code 1910, § 5640), as amended by the act of December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 35); but no such objection was made to its allowance at the time it was offered, and it appears from the recitals in the bill of exceptions that the judge disallowed it, not because of a failure to attach the statutory affidavit, but upon the ground that the matter referred to did not constitute a valid defense to the action. Had the point been made at the trial, it could have been met, if need be, by making the affidavit. Ward v.

Frick Co., 95 Ga. 804, 22 S. E. 899. At any rate, the defendant would have had an opportunity to do so. But, in view of the recitals in the bill of exceptions as to the ground on which this amendment was disallowed, it would be going too far to deprive a defendant of a substantial defense for the mere reason that no affidavit was attached, and the judge might not have exercised his discretion in allowing it to be filed without an affidavit, when it appears from the bill of exceptions that it was not disallowed on discretionary grounds. If the amendment was open to such objection, the plaintiff should have urged that with the other objections which were made; but he waived its form by objecting to its sufficiency in law without making the question as to its form. Moreover, when the original plea is considered in connection with what appeared in the affidavit for bail in the trover suit, attached as an exhibit to the petition in the action on the case, the matters set up in the amendment were merely enlargement upon the matters set up in the original plea, and did not set forth any new facts or defense so as to require an affidavit under the statutes above mentioned.

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*) — SALES OF STANDING TIMBER — DEFICIENCY IN ACREAGE.

Where a deed conveyed all the sawmill timber on certain named lots of land, "there being 400 acres, more or less," in a suit seeking to recover for a deficiency in the acreage of the timbered land, it was necessary to allege actual fraud upon the part of the grantor. Kendall v. Wells, 126 Ga. 343, 55 S. E. 41; Emlen v. Roper, 133 Ga. 728, 66 S. E. 934; Montgomery v. Robertson, 134 Ga. 66, 67 S. E. 431; Currie v. Collins, 136 Ga. 473, 71 S. E. 798.

2. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*) — SALES OF STANDING TIMBER—FRAUD.

Allegations that the vendor had owned the various lots of land on which the timber was situated for a number of years, said he knew there were 400 acres, and guaranteed it, and, if there were not 400 acres, he would make it good, and that the purchaser relied entirely upon the guaranty of the vendor as to the number of acres, and there was a deficiency, were not sufficient to show actual fraud upon the part of the vendor, authorizing a recovery for such deficiency.

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 36*) — PLEADING—PETITION.

An amendment which alleged that the trade was based on the fact that there were 400 acres of timbered land, that the purchaser bought the timber at the rate of $12 per acre, that the vendor prepared and executed a deed and placed it in a bank, with a draft attached to it for the purchase price, and wrote to the purchaser that he had made and forwarded a deed in accordance with the terms of their trade, and that the purchaser believed him to be a reliable man, and therefore did not examine the deed before paying the draft, and did not know that the deed read "400 acres, more or less," was not a sufficient allegation to furnish a basis for a prayer for reformation of the deed "by striking out the words 'more or less,' and [making it] speak the truth of the trade as made, to wit, 400 acres, at $12 per acre"; it not appearing that there was any agreement as to what the deed should contain on this subject, or anything to prevent the purchaser from examining it before accepting it, or anything to show when he did discover its contents, or that he promptly repudiated it, or sought equitable relief upon the discovery. *Weaver v. ## 1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 43*)—VOLUNTARY DISMISSAL—REINSTATEMENT.

Where a plaintiff institutes an action against three defendants, praying to recover damages for trespassing on a described tract of land and to enjoin future trespasses, and subsequently amends his action by alleging that the three defendants are in possession of the land, to which he claims title, and praying for a recovery of the land and mesne profits, the suit is converted into an action to recover land and mesne profits; and where he dismisses the action, and brings another against one of the defendants to recover the same land and mesne profits, the second suit is to be treated as a renewal of the dismissed action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 43*)—VOLUNTARY DISMISSAL—REINSTATEMENT—PAYMENT OF COSTS.

Where a plaintiff dismisses his action, and a judgment for costs is entered, which includes the fees of witnesses, the action cannot be renewed without paying the costs embraced in the judgment (or filing an affidavit of inability to pay), so long as the judgment for costs is not reversed, set aside, or modified in some manner provided by law.

Error from Superior Court, Pike County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by G. P. Huguley against Luther Holmes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. T. Daniel and T. E. Patterson, for plaintiff in error. Philip H. Alston and C. J. Lester, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. G. P. Huguley brought suit against Luther Holmes to recover a described tract of land and mesne profits. The defendant filed a plea in abatement, alleging that the action was in renewal of a former suit brought by the same plaintiff against Luther Holmes, Mrs. Anna Holmes, and W. A. Pough to recover the same land and mesne profits, which had been voluntarily dismissed by the plaintiff, and the renewed action was instituted without the payment of costs or the filing of an affidavit of the plaintiff's inability to pay costs. The issue formed on the plea in abatement was tried before the judge without a jury, who rendered a judgment dismissing the plea. The exception is to this judgment.

[1] 1. It is insisted that the two suits are not identical. There is no dispute that both suits were instituted by the same plaintiff and concern the same land. The first suit began as a suit to enjoin the three defendants from trespassing upon the land and to recover damages for trespasses already committed. Pending the suit an amendment was allowed, alleging that all three of the defendants were in possession of the land, and that the plaintiff claimed title thereto, and praying to recover the land and rents, issues, and profits from the defendants. This amendment converted the first suit into an action to recover the land and mesne profits from the three defendants. The only difference, therefore, between the present and the former action, is that in the first there were three defendants, and in the present two of those defendants were dropped and the action was brought against only one of them. In order to make the second suit a renewal of the first, it must be for substantially the same cause of action, though it need not be a literal copy of the petition dismissed. Hudgins v. Crow, 82 Ga. 372. It must be by the same plaintiff or his legal representative. Moody v. Threlkeld, 18 Ga. 55 (5). And against all who are necessary parties defendant in the first suit. Cox v. Strickland, 120 Ga. 104, 47 S. E. 912. If the defendants in the first action sued as joint contractors, or entitled to rights one against another by way of contribution in the event the plaintiff recovers, then they or their personal representatives must be parties to the second suit. Ford v. Clark, 75 Ga. 612; White v. Moss, 92 Ga. 246, 18 S. E. 13. In ejectment, defendants have no right to demand contribution. They cannot defend unless they admit possession; and only such defendants as are in actual possession are necessary parties to the action. Therefore, if a suit be instituted against three defendants in possession, and pending that suit two of them abandon their possession, and the suit is voluntarily discontinued by the plaintiff and renewed, the only necessary defendant in the renewed suit would be the party who remained in possession. In Cox v. Berry, 13 Ga. 306, an action of ejectment was brought by A. against B. as tenant in possession. C., the landlord, was made a party defendant. Being unable to prove possession in B., the plaintiff dismissed after the bar of the statute attached. Within six months he brought a suit for the same land against D. as tenant in possession, to which C. was a party defendant. C. pleaded the statute of limitations. In answer to the proposition that the second suit was not a renewal of the first, because of a different tenant, the court said that it was certainly the same as far as the landlord, C., was concerned. "It is for the same land, in favor of the same plaintiff, and he was a party defendant to both" actions. We therefore hold that the second suit was a renewal of the first action.

[2] 2. The statute declares that when any suit is dismissed, and the plaintiff desires to recommence the suit, he may do so on the payment of costs, or filing with his petition an affidavit that owing to his poverty he is unable to pay the cost. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5625, 5626. The failure to pay the costs or file the statutory affidavit may be pleaded in abatement of the second action. Wright v. Jett, 120 Ga. 995, 48 S. E. 345. The question is whether or not, according to the facts appearing in the record, the plaintiff has brought himself within the statute as to renewing a suit voluntarily dismissed. It appears that the first suit resulted in a verdict finding for the plaintiff the premises in dispute, which verdict was set aside on motion for new trial. The plaintiff then voluntarily dismissed his case, whereupon the following judgment was rendered by the court: "The plaintiff having in open court by his attorney dismissed this case, it is ordered that Luther Holmes, for the use of the officers of court, do have and recover of and from the plaintiff, George P. Huguley, the sum of $103.85, costs of court in this case." The clerk of the court testified that he rendered a bill of costs to the plaintiff's attorney (which bill of costs included the court costs and witness fees as taxed in the judgment), who paid to him $40.15, the amount of the court costs, but did not pay any of the witness fees, and the same have not been paid. The subpoenas of the various witnesses, claimed in the itemized statement of costs, accompanied with an affidavit showing the number of days each attended court on the subpoena and the amount claimed by each, were introduced. These several amounts corresponded with the itemized statement of the bill of costs, which was introduced in evidence. "When a case is disposed of, the costs of the same, including fees of witnesses, shall be included in the judgment against the party dismissing, being nonsuited, or cast; and it shall be the duty of the clerk of any court in this state, and of any justice of the peace, or other officer who may issue an execution, to indorse on said execution, at the time it is issued, the date and amount of the judgment, the items of the bill of cost (written in words), and the amount of each item distinctly stated in figures; and no costs, or items of costs, shall in any case be demanded by any such officer, which are not itemized and indorsed as herein provided." Civil Code 1910, § 5992. It is true that the judgment was entered up in the name of only one of the defendants for the use of the officers of court; but we consider this a mere informality. If the judgment for costs passed on the order of dismissal be simply erroneous, and not void upon its face, the defendant is bound by it until it is reversed or set aside in some of the ways provided by law.

It is contended that the evidence fails to disclose that any witness demanded payment of his fees from the plaintiff or his attorney, and that it is not made affirmatively to appear that the witnesses were entitled to the fees included in the judgment. The Code provides that no party shall be liable for the costs of any witness of the adverse party, unless such witness was subpoenaed, sworn, and examined on the trial of the cause (where the case was tried), and no party shall be liable for the costs of more than two witnesses to the same point, unless the court shall certify that the question at issue was of such character as rendered a greater number of witnesses necessary to a single point. Civil Code 1910, § 5990. The reply to this contention is that it appears that the witnesses made affidavits upon their subpoenas as to their service and the amounts to which they were entitled, and these amounts were included in the judgment for costs rendered by the court. It is to be presumed that in rendering the judgment the court adjudicated the costs to be proper charges, and that judgment is conclusive upon the parties until it is vacated and set aside, or modified, and is not subject to collateral attack.

It is also contended that the statute which authorizes a renewal of a dismissed action upon the payment of costs only contemplates the payment of court costs, and does not require the plaintiff to pay witness fees. The statute broadly states that the payment of costs is a condition precedent to the bringing of the action, and witness fees are a part of the costs. In renewing his action the plaintiff would not be required to pay costs of witnesses which have not been demanded of him, or which may not have been included in the judgment for costs. Shippen L. Co. v. Gates, 136 Ga. 38, 70 S. E. 672. But where the witnesses have filed their subpoenas with the clerk, with affidavits annexed as required by the statute, and such witness fees are included in the judgment for costs, the plaintiff must pay such fees, unless the judgment for costs is set aside, or modified, on motion to retax the costs. Under the facts appearing in the record, the plaintiff had paid only a part of the costs accrued before instituting the second suit, and therefore the plea in abatement should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed.

WILLS (§ 635*)—CONSTRUCTION—SURVIVORSHIP.

This case was before the Supreme Court upon a former occasion. 132 Ga. 779, 65 S. E. 68. After the return of the remittitur, the case was tried and a verdict directed in favor of the plaintiff upon uncontradicted evidence. The right of the plaintiff to a recovery was made to turn upon the construction of the twelfth item of a will which went into effect in 1863, as follows: "I give and bequeath to my daughter Mary Frances Hightower, for and during her natural life, and at her death to be equally divided between her children that may survive her, the following property, to wit," etc.; it being contended by the plaintiff that two children of the life tenant, Mary Frances Hightower, born after the will went into effect, and who were in life at the death of the life tenant, took in remainder under the terms of the will, and became tenants in common with two other children of the life tenant, who were in esse at the time the will went into effect and were in life at the death of the life tenant. Held, that the survivorship contemplated by this will expressly refers to the death of the life tenant, and not to that of the testator, and that the children born after the will went into effect, and who were in life at the death of the life tenant, took under the will in common with the other two surviving children, who were in life at the time the will went into effect. *Cooper v. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 22, 1911.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 326*)—FORFEITURES—KEEPING GASOLINE ON PREMISES.

Upon the trial of an action on a policy of fire insurance, covering a lot of furniture, bedding, etc., stored in a building used for storage, where the policy contained a stipulation that it should be void if gasoline were kept, used, or allowed on the premises, and where the only evidence as to gasoline being on the premises was testimony tending to show that an employé of the insured, about midnight, carried a can of gasoline into the storehouse, and shortly thereafter a fire was discovered in the building, which destroyed it, it was not error, as against the defendant company, for the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If you should find that the defendant has established to your satisfaction that there was kept, used, or allowed by the plaintiff, or with his knowledge, or through his complicity, direct or indirect, any gasoline upon the premises at the time of the operation of this policy, that also would make void the policy, and there could be no recovery." "If it is proved that it is of the value stated in the policy, and that it was destroyed without any complicity on his part, he would be entitled to recover up to the value stated in the policy." "Should you conclude that this property in question was insured by the plaintiff, that it was destroyed by fire at the place named in the insurance policy through no act upon his part, you should find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, in which even your verdict would be, 'We, the jury, find for the plaintiff,' naming the sum." Such instructions did not, under the evidence submitted, place an unauthorized burden upon the defendant. If an employé of the plaintiff had carried a can of gasoline upon the premises for the purpose of burning the house containing the goods insured, and it was so used, then such act would not constitute keeping, using, or allowing gasoline on the premises by the plaintiff, if it was carried there without his knowledge or through his complicity, directly or indirectly.

2. WITNESSES (§ 395*)—CORROBORATION—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, for the purpose of impeaching a witness, an affidavit made by him prior to the trial, containing statements contradictory to the testimony given by him on the trial, was introduced in evidence, it was not error to reject an affidavit made by the witness prior to the affidavit introduced to impeach him, which first affidavit was in accordance with his testimony before the jury.

3. INSURANCE (§ 648*)—ACTION OF POLICY—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

The court did not err in excluding evidence tending to show that, some five months prior to the burning of the goods covered by the policy sued on, the plaintiff had suffered another loss by fire, in no way connected with the loss which was the subject-matter of the action on trial, and had compromised with the insurance company which had issued a policy on the other goods.

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 35*)—TERMINATION OF PROSECUTION—RIGHT OF ACTION.

In a suit for malicious prosecution, where it appears that on the 25th of September, 1908, the defendant caused a warrant to be sworn out against the plaintiff, and caused him to be arrested, and then offered to dismiss the warrant if the plaintiff would pay a sum of money, which the plaintiff refused to pay, and the defendant thereupon ordered the officer to release him, which was done, and that afterward, on the 7th of March, 1909, he again caused the plaintiff to be arrested on the same warrant, and caused him to be kept in jail for some eight or nine days, until the judge of the city court having jurisdiction to try the case ordered him released on his own recognizance, and that afterward, on the 28th of June, the judge of the city court, on the motion of the solicitor, ordered the warrant dismissed, and the suit was filed on the 9th of August following, it sufficiently appears that the prosecution had terminated before the beginning of the suit, in the absence of any showing that the defendant had otherwise attempted to renew the prosecution. *Hartshorn v. HILL, C. J. As far as the allegations relate to negligence of the master in furnishing an engine with a pilot instead of an engine with a footboard, this was an assumed risk; but this allegation is pertinent, and proof of the fact would be relevant, as illustrative of another alleged ground of negligence, that the engineer, with knowledge of the increased danger in the use of the engine failed to keep a proper lookout, and because of this omission failed to promptly stop the engine when he saw, or by the exercise of due diligence should have seen, the plaintiff when he slipped off the pilot in attempting to make a coupling therefrom. The engineer, knowing that the switchman was in an unusually dangerous position, though as to that position the risk was assumed, should have taken precaution accordingly. On the acts of negligence charged against the engineer, the petition was sufficient to withstand a general demurrer; the employment being one as to which the defense of fellow service has been abolished by statute.

RUSSELL, J. Ray sued Cheek and Teasley & Co. for the price of certain fertilizer. He showed that the fertilizer had been delivered to Cheek by him, and further testified that he delivered it upon the strength of the following letter: "To Whom It may Concern: Mr. I. W. Cheek wants about two and one-half tons of good guano. He was to get it from us, but we are out. He is all right, and will pay for it, if anybody will let him have it at Airline, Ga. We would not hesitate, if so desired, to go his security for it, as we do not want him put to any more trouble in getting it than possible. [Signed] T. W. Teasley & Co." The court instructed the jury that, if Ray acted on faith of this letter, it was adequate to bind Teasley & Co. (which, by the way, was merely a trading name for T. W. Teasley, there being no other partner in the company) as security.

We think that the letter was no more than a written recommendation; but, even if the last sentence of the letter could be construed as more than a recommendation, we do not think that it is capable of being construed as more than an offer to stand security; that is, to be jointly liable with Cheek upon a contract afterward to be made. The language of the contract in the case cited in Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty (3d Ed.) § 148, is even stronger than the language here expressed, yet in that case it was held that a contract of suretyship did not arise. As the matter is there stated: "A party wrote a letter introducing another, stating that he wanted to purchase a certain amount of goods, and concluding: 'I consider him perfectly good, and, if required, will indorse for him to that amount.' Held, he was not liable for goods sold on the strength of this letter, unless he had been requested to indorse, and had refused. The guaranty was conditional, to be created by indorsement, if required, and the protection of the party writing the letter may have depended upon the form of the security." (Italics ours.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 87*) — DISABILITIES — CONTRACTS — SURETYSHIP.

A woman can neither stand surety for her husband's debts nor lawfully pay them, and if, having executed a promissory note as security for her husband, she pays the note, she may maintain an action for money had and received and recover the sum so paid from the creditor who knowingly received it. Strickland v. Vance, 99 Ga. 531, 27 S. E. 152, 59 Am. St. Rep. 241. As to other persons, she may not lawfully become surety, but she may pay their debts. Villa Rica Lumber Co. v. Paratain, 92 Ga. 370, 17 S. E. 340. Hence, if a married woman executes a promissory note as surety for a person other than her husband, she cannot be compelled by law to pay it, but, if she voluntarily pays it, she cannot recover back from the creditor the amount she has paid.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 54*) — CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF CONTRACT—EFFECT AS TO TITLE.

Upon the execution and delivery of bond for title to land, the equitable title charged with the payment of the purchase money passes to the vendee, and the vendor holds the legal title only as security for the unpaid residue of the purchase money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 78*) — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—TIME AS ESSENCE OF CONTRACT.

As to making the payments stipulated for in the sale of land where bond for title is given, time is usually not of the essence of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 93*) — RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—RESCISSION BY VENDOR.

If the vendee under a bond for title defaults in his payments, the vendor has the right to rescind upon giving the vendee notice that he will insist upon prompt payment and upon returning to him the amount of the purchase-money which he has paid, plus the value of any permanent improvements which he may have placed upon the land, less the damages which have been occasioned to the vendor by the vendee's failure to perform the contract.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 208*) — REMEDIES OF PURCHASER—RECOVERY OF PURCHASE MONEY PAID—DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.

If without having completed the rescission by restoring the status the vendor in the bond for title resells the property to a third person, who takes without notice of the vendee's equitable title, the vendee may treat the resale either as a rescission of the sale or as a breach of the bond. If he elects to treat it as a rescission, he may recover from the vendor the amount of purchase money he has paid, and the value of the permanent improvements he has placed upon the land, less the damages which have been occasioned by reason of his (the vendee's) failure to perform the contract. If he treats it as a breach of the bond, the measure of damages is the value of the premises at the time of the resale, less the amount due on the unpaid purchase money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 46*) — COMPUTATION OF LIMITATION—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

Where a vendor in a bond for title breaches his bond by a resale of the property, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the time of the resale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 248; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by W. L. Duvall against A. E. Buck and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

L. P. Skeen, for plaintiffs in error. R. D. Smith and Fulwood & Murray, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Duvall sued Buck & Downing for breach of the covenant contained in a bond for title. His petition shows that on June 25, 1903, he purchased from Buck & Downing certain real estate, for which he agreed to pay them $705 on terms of $5 cash, $175 on July 12th, $175 on August 12th, and $350 on December 12th thereafter, Buck & Downing executing to him their bond for title, conditioned to make him title upon payment to them of the full purchase price; that he paid to them the $5 and the two notes for $175 each, making a total payment of $355, but failed to pay the note for $350 due on December 12, 1903; that on July 1, 1908, Buck & Downing resold the land to other persons for $1,250; and that Buck & Downing have never rescinded by paying back any of the $355 paid them, or by returning or offering to return the unpaid note. He alleges that Buck & Downing are liable to him in the sum of $1,026, this amount being the difference between the price at which they resold the property in 1908 and the balance which he failed to pay them, with interest. Buck & Downing demurred to this petition on several grounds, and the case is before this court on exception to the overruling of the demurrer.

[1] "The execution and delivery of the bond for title creates a special form of trust estate. The equitable title, charged with the payment of the purchase money, passes to the vendee, and the vendor holds the legal title charged with the use that, while it may be asserted to secure the payment of the purchase money in full, nevertheless, as soon as the purchase money is paid, it (the legal title) is to pass to the vendee, his heirs or assigns." Powell, Actions for Land, § 374, and cases there cited.

[3] However, the failure of the vendee to pay according to the terms of his contract authorizes the vendor to rescind. Rescission involves the restoration of the original status so far as it is practicable, and, if the vendee has paid a portion of the purchase price, it is the duty of the vendor to pay him his money back after deducting an amount sufficient to cover the loss occurring to him by reason of the vendee's failure to perform his contract. In case of rescission the vendor stands bound to account to the vendee for the amount of the purchase money which the vendee has paid, together with the value of such permanent improvements as have been made by the vendee, less the damages which have been occasioned by the vendee's failure to perform his contract. As to all these general propositions, see Powell, Actions for Land, §§ 378, 379, where there is a full discussion of the subject.

[4] If the petition in the present case showed a case of rescission, the measure of damages would be, not the value of the premises at the time of the resale by the vendor (subject to deduction on account of the unpaid note due by the plaintiff to the defendant), but the amount that the plaintiff had paid to the defendants, less any damages that had been occasioned to the defendants by reason of the plaintiff's having failed to perform his contract. However, the petition does not allege a rescission of the sale, but alleges a breach of the contract evidenced by the bond for title; and in such a case the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 4401, are applicable, as follows: "Upon breach of a bond for title to land, the value of the premises at the time of the breach, with interest thereon, should be the measure of damages." The defendants have not rescinded for they have retained not only the money that was paid them, but also the note given them by the plaintiff. Of course, the plaintiff could have considered the resale of the property as a rescission of the contract, and could have proceeded to recover back the money equitably due him in accordance with the principle announced in the case of McDaniel v. Gray & Co., 69 Ga. 433, 435. On the other hand, it was his option to treat it as a breach of the contract, and to sue for the higher measure of damages. The petition is silent as to whether the plaintiff was in possession of the land at the time the resale was made. If he was, the second vendee would have taken with notice of his rights, and the sale would not necessarily have operated as a breach of the bond. A demurrer to the petition on the ground that it was not alleged whether the plaintiff was or was not in possession of the land might have been well taken, but no such point was made, either in this court or in the lower court. From the way in which the case was argued, it is evident that the plaintiff was not in possession of the property at the time of the resale, and that the second vendee was a purchaser without notice, so that the plaintiff cannot pay to him the remaining $350 with interest, and get title to the land. The plaintiff not being in possession of the land and time not being of the essence of the contract, in the bond for title or otherwise, it was incumbent on the defendants, before reselling, to effect a rescission, and, even then it would seem that notwithstanding the delay which had occurred, they should have given the plaintiff notice that they were going to insist upon prompt performance before making a rescission. Ellis v. Bryant, 120 Ga. 890, 894, 48 S. E. 352. Under the facts alleged, we think that the petition set out a cause of action, and that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer.

[5] 2. The point is made that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. We think that the plaintiff's cause of action arose on the day of the resale; and as the statutory period, counting from that time, has not expired, this point is not well taken. Judgment affirmed.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 155*)—CONSTRUCTION—GENERAL RULES.

"The law will not construe a contract so as to give the debtor the right to destroy it by a simple refusal to comply with it, unless the terms of the contract are so clear and unambiguous as to make irresistible the conclusion that no other result could possibly be reached."

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 72*)—CREATION OF RELATION—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—COMPENSATION.

Where a contract of employment provides that it shall remain in force so long as is mutually satisfactory, and that the rate of wages shall be so much, but that the employé shall be entitled to so much extra compensation per month, provided he remain in the service until a set date, and not otherwise, the proper construction of the agreement is that either party may terminate the contract at will; and if the employé quits before the time set, or by his wrongful conduct makes it reasonable and just for his employer to discharge him prior to that time, he forfeits the extra compensation, but, if the employer himself voluntarily and without cause sooner terminates the contract, the employé is entitled to a ratable part of the extra compensation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 75*)—CREATION OF RELATION—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT.

A contract by which an employer is to pay the employé a certain amount as wages in any event, and an additional amount in the event he remains in the employment till the end of the contract, is not unenforceable as to the extra compensation on the ground that it is nudum pactum.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 43*)—TERMINATION OF RELATION—GROUNDS FOR DISCHARGE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether fighting on the show grounds by the plaintiff, who was a working man employed by the proprietor of a circus, was (especially in the absence of all evidence as to the nature and cause of the fight) a reasonable cause for his discharge, was a question for solution by the jury, and is not a matter absolutely settled as a matter of law by the express provisions of the contract.

8. ATTACHMENT (§ 204*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; J. H. Merrill, Judge.

Action by John Rogers against E. Haag. To a judgment of the superior court overruling certiorari to review a judgment of a magistrate for plaintiff, defendant sued out a writ of error. Affirmed.

Hendricks & Christian, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Knight, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. In June, 1909, Haag, the proprietor of a circus, as party of the first part, and Rogers, as party of the second part, made the following contract: "The said party of the second part hereby agrees to render services as working man for the season commencing on or about July 20 and to continue for the show season, or so long as mutually agreeable to both parties, under the following conditions: 1st. Second party of the second part agrees to render services to Haag's Mighty Shows, in a painstaking manner, and to be responsible for all property damaged by careless driving or willful carelessness of any kind. 2d. Party of the second part agrees to abide by all rules made by the party of the first part, and for any violation of said rules is liable to a fine of one week's salary, or dismissal, and contract annulled. 3d. Party of the first part agrees to pay to the said party of the second part the sum of $10.00 per month, or if the said party of the second part remain in the employment of the party of the first part until close of season in Dec. 31, 1909, party of second part is to be paid at the rate of $18.00 per month, but under no circumstances, if party of the second part fail to remain until said close of season, shall he be paid over the rate of $10.00 per month. 4th. Party of the second part can in no way obtain settlement in full of the $10.00 per month rate unless party of the first part has been notified in written form, two weeks previous to settlement. 5th. The party of the first part agrees that said party of the second part is to have a plenty to eat, always the best obtainable under circumstances and the place we are in; also that party of the second part is to have the best of treatment if his duties are performed in a painstaking manner. 6th. The management reserves the right to temporarily close the season for cause, during which time no salaries shall be paid. 7th. Be it clearly understood by party of the second part that under no circumstances, during the life of this contract, is party of first part liable for any damages, for any accident that may happen to party of the second part. 8th. Party of the second part furthermore agrees that no compensation other than board, transportation and $1.00 in cash will be given him should he render less than one month service. 9th. $5.00 fine for each drunk or fight on show grounds. Witness whereof hereunto set our hands and seals." On the back of the contract, which was duly signed by both parties, is the following: "Working Man's Contract. Haag's Shows. E. Haag, Proprietor. For each drunk on or around show grounds, $5.00 fine. For each fight on show grounds, $5.00 fine. I agree to pay the above fines. [Signed] John Rogers." On November 2d Rogers had a fight on the show grounds. Haag's manager discharged him, and tendered to him $2.25 in full settlement of the balance due him. It is undisputed that, if it is proper to compute the wages at the rate of $10 per month, the correct amount was tendered, and that, if they should be computed at the rate of $18 per month, $30.25 would be due. Rogers sued out before a magistrate an attachment, which was levied on a gray horse, and the defendant replevied by giving a bond for the eventual condemnation money. On the trial of the case the magistrate gave judgment in the plaintiff's favor for $30.25. From this judgment the defendant sought certiorari, but, on the hearing in the superior court, the judge overruled it, and to this judgment the writ of error now before us was sued out.

[8] As the plaintiff in error (defendant in the original suit) sought certiorari directly from the decision of the magistrate without appealing to a jury, he is in the position where he must assume the burden of showing that there was nothing to submit to a jury; i. e., that the evidence demanded as a matter of law a finding in his favor. Every issuable fact is to be taken against him. That the plaintiff fought on the show ground is undisputed. The circumstances of the fight do not appear. It is not shown whether the plaintiff was the aggressor in the fight, or whether the fight was thrust upon him as a matter of self-defense or by other reasons of justification. Whether fighting on the show grounds (in the absence of contractual stipulations on the subject) is sufficient cause for discharge would seem to be a jury question. So the judgment in the plaintiff's favor should stand, unless the contract itself is of such a nature as to forbid the recovery.

[1] The contract provided for wages at the rate of $10 per month, which were paid or tendered, but stipulated for an additional $8 per month to be paid if the plaintiff remained in the employment until the end of the season. Only this additional $8 per month is involved; and the defendant's contention is that, as the plaintiff did not remain until the end of the season, but was sooner discharged, the language of the contract itself forbids a recovery. It is pointed out that there is an express provision in the contract that it was to continue only "so long as mutually agreeable to both parties," and that, therefore, the defendant had the right to terminate the employment at his will, either with or without cause. "The law will not construe a contract so as to give the debtor the right to destroy it by a simple refusal to comply with it, unless the terms of the contract are so clear and unambiguous as to make irresistible the conclusion that no other result could possibly be reached, and that such was the intention of the parties. Civ. Code 1895, § 3675, par. 4 (Civ. Code 1910, § 4268). Nor will a contract be so construed as to authorize one of the parties to take advantage of his own wrong, unless it be plain and manifest that such was the intention of the parties." Finlay v. Luden & B. Co., 105 Ga. 264, 31 S. E. 180; Milledgeville Cotton Co. v. Cary, 9 Ga. App. —; 71 S. E. 503.

[2] 2. Applying the rule just quoted, we are of the opinion that the proper construction to give the contract before us is that either party might terminate it at will; that if the plaintiff terminated it prior to the close of the season, or caused it to be terminated by such conduct on his part as would ordinarily authorize a discharge, he forfeited all claim to compensation beyond $10 per month; that, if the defendant terminated it voluntarily and without the plaintiff's having first given adequate cause, he would be liable not only for the $10 per month, but for the additional $8 per month which was being held back as a guaranty against the plaintiff's quitting the employment before the close of the season. It is frequently the case that an employer is willing to pay a higher rate of wages to a servant who will bind himself to remain in the employment for a definite period, or so long as the employer may desire to keep him, than to one who may quit at a time when his services are most needed. It is entirely legitimate for an employer to contract that the employé shall have so much wages for his services generally, and so much additional if he does not quit prior to a named date. It is also legitimate (when the terms of the contract so permit) for the employer to hold back the extra pay until lapse of time has demonstrated that the employé has done his part. But in such a case, unless the language of the contract is too clear to admit of any other reasonable interpretation, the employer cannot capriciously terminate the contract himself so as to avoid liability for the wages at the higher rate. Here the season was nearly over. To construe the contract as allowing the defendant then to terminate it without sufficient cause, and thereby to deprive the plaintiff of the extra compensation which was being held back as a guaranty against his quitting, would be to give the contract an oppressive and unnatural effect, which can hardly be said to have been within the fair contemplation of the parties. If he could thus terminate and forfeit the plaintiff's extra compensation in November, why not in late December, say on the day before the set time would have expired?

[3] 3. The plaintiff in error makes also the point that the agreement to pay the extra compensation of $8 per month is unenforceable because nudum pactum. He relies on the case of Davis v. Morgan, 117 Ga. 504, 43 S. E. 732, 61 L. R. A. 148, 97 Am. St. Rep. 171. That decision holds that "where a contract of employment is made for one year at a stipulated salary per month, an agreement during the term to receive less, or to pay more, than the contract price is void, unless supported by some change in place, hours, character of employment, or other consideration." The distinction is plain. In that case the agreement for the extra compensation was not made as a part of the original contract, so as to be based on the consideration of mutual promises by which the contract as a whole was supported, but in the present case it was. In that case the extra compensation was purely a promised gift or bonus. In this case the extra compensation was a part of the wages promised, though it was only conditionally promised.

[4] 4. It is also contended that the contract itself made fighting on the show ground ipso facto a cause for discharge, and that the court should have so held as a matter of law. A section of the contract made violation of the employer's rules a cause for discharge, but it is not shown that fighting on the show ground was a violation of rules, within the purview of that section of the contract. That section (which is quoted above) seems to deal with other matters, since fighting on the show ground is specifically dealt with in another way. The plaintiff agreed to pay a "fine of $5.00" for that. It is true that this clause of the contract which provides for the fine may be unenforceable, because it stipulates for a civil penalty, still it is adequate to indicate that the parties did not consider fighting on the show grounds as falling within the section of the contract which relates to violation of rules. Since the contract appears to have been prepared by the defendant, it must be construed most strongly against him.

[7, 8] 5. The further points made are: (1) "That the attachment and levy were not introduced in evidence." (2) "That there was no proof that the property levied on was that of the defendant or in his possession." (3) "That the description of the property is too indefinite to identify the property and base a judgment," and one or two more of a similar nature. The attachment was a part of the pleadings. We know of no rule requiring it to be introduced in evidence on the trial of the attachment case itself. The gray horse was levied on as the property of the defendant, and he replevied. This is a sufficient answer to the other points. On some of its points the case is a close one, but we have reached the conclusion that the judgment complained of should stand.

Judgment affirmed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 800*)—TORTS —DEFECT IN HIGHWAY—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY.

To make a municipality liable for an injury caused by a defect in a highway, the defect need not have been the sole cause of the injury; but if, besides the defect, there was another cause not attributable to the negligence of the injured person, and which contributed directly but concurrently to causing the injury, the corporation may still be liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for the defect in the highway. In such case the concurrent acts of negligence of both wrongdoers, and not the separate act of either one, would constitute the proximate cause of the injury.

Twiggs & Gazan, for plaintiff in error. Saml. B. Adams, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff was driving a horse attached to a buggy on Estill avenue, a public street or highway in the corporate limits of the city of Savannah. This street or avenue at the time was in process of being widened under a contract made with the city and in pursuance of specifications furnished by the city. The widening of the street, and the location of the new grade lines caused thereby, placed the sidewalks about two feet lower than the old roadway of the street. Accordingly, excavations were made on the north side of the street, two feet lower than the traveled surface of the highway and extending the entire length of blocks. This excavation was eight feet wide, and was made into the roadway proper. There was no barrier, guard rail, or other fencing or protection about the excavation. It was open, and the descent from the roadway to the bottom of the excavation was precipitous, and on the bottom of the excavation an artificial stone walk was laid. In the afternoon of July 10, 1909, the plaintiff was driving her horse and buggy along this avenue, on the north or right side, which was the proper side for her to take, and which was the side nearest and next to the excavation, and while she was still on the avenue an automobile approached from the opposite direction, and, because of the narrowed condition of the street, appeared to be headed directly for the horse and buggy. The automobile was going at a rapid rate of speed, probably faster than that allowed by the city ordinance on the subject, and passed within about three feet of the horse, but did not strike either the horse or the buggy. As the automobile neared the horse, he shied and backed the buggy into the excavation, precipitating the plaintiff therein, causing her severe injuries. The horse did not become otherwise frightened or attempt to run away, or become uncontrollable. The plaintiff brought suit against the city, setting forth the foregoing facts, alleging negligence on the part of the city in not having the excavation properly protected by guard rails or other means of protection, and insisting that this negligence was the proximate cause of her injuries. The city filed a general demurrer, insisting that under the allegations of the petition the unguarded excavation was not negligence, and, besides, that it was not the proximate cause of the injuries, but that the proximate cause of the injuries was the negligence of the driver of the automobile in running at a too high rate of speed, and that but for this negligence the injuries would not have resulted. The court overruled the demurrer, and to this ruling the defendant excepts in its cross-bill of exceptions.

On the trial of the case the jury found a verdict in favor of the city. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial, based on numerous grounds, was overruled, and she excepted.

The numerous questions raised have been most elaborately and ably argued by counsel for both parties, and exhaustive briefs have been filed. We do not consider it necessary to consider the many questions therein discussed, or to enter into a dissertation on the subject of proximate cause. This subject has been so repeatedly and exhaustively discussed by both text-writers and judges that we do not think that we could make any illuminating addition to the subject.

After giving the case a most thorough and painstaking investigation, we have decided that the plaintiff is entitled to another trial. Even conceding that she would not have been hurt but for the fright of the horse, and that the rapidly approaching automobile was responsible for that fright, yet she could still recover from the city if her injuries would not have been sustained but for the presence of the unguarded excavation. We think that under the evidence it is clearly issuable whether or not her injuries would have been caused by the running and the approach of the automobile and the frightening of the horse, even if the city had properly guarded or protected the excavation. The principle of law is well settled that, where two concurrent causes operate in causing an injury, there can be a recovery against both or either one of the parties responsible for these two concurrent causes. To make the principle applicable to the facts of this case, although the jury may have believed that the approaching automobile caused the horse to become frightened, yet the plaintiff was nevertheless entitled to recover, if the jury further believed that the injury would not have occurred as a consequence of such fright and the backing of the buggy if the excavation had been protected or guarded in such manner as to prevent the buggy from being backed into it and the plaintiff thrown therefrom. The rule was first stated in the case of Wilson v. City of Atlanta, 60 Ga. 474, that, where other causes concur with municipal negligence to produce the injury, the corporation is liable for all damages which its culpable negligence contributed substantially and proximately to cause, as where one while observing due care for his personal safety is injured by the combined result of an accident and the negligence of the municipal corporation in respect to a defect or obstruction, and without such negligence the injury would not have occurred; and the fact that the injury may have been increased by other concurring causes would not excuse the municipal negligence without which the injury would not have happened. 28 Cyc. 1408, 1412; 2 Smith's Modern Law of Municipal Corporations, § 1296; Tiedeman on Municipal Corporations, § 351; Williams on Municipal Liability for Tort, 168; 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (4th Ed.) 1259; Elliott on Roads and Streets (Ed. 1890) 451, 452; 5 Thompson's Commentary on Negligence, 538, 539. In the Wilson Case, supra, plaintiff was riding in a buggy on a street in the city of Atlanta, near a point where there was an unguarded embankment, and the horse became frightened by the blowing of a whistle of a nearby factory and ran over the embankment, overturning the buggy and injuring the plaintiff, and the principle of liability for concurrent negligence was fully discussed and settled by the decision of the Supreme Court rendered in that case, where it was held that the city was liable because the unguarded embankment, whether the proximate cause of the injury or not, was certainly a concurring cause with the frightening of the horse caused by the blowing of the whistle of the factory in causing the injury. There are many other decisions by the Supreme Court of this state reaffirming the principle announced in the Wilson Case. See Trippe v. City of Atlanta, 68 Ga. 834; Jackson v. City of Buena Vista, 88 Ga. 406, 14 S. E. 867; Bryan v. City of Macon, 91 Ga. 530, 18 S. E. 351; Georgia Railroad v. Mayo, 92 Ga. 224, 17 S. E. 1000; L. & N. Railroad v. Barnwell, 131 Ga. 791, 63 S. E. 501. See, also, the case of Harrell v. City of Macon, 1 Ga. App. 413, 58 S. E. 124. The overwhelming weight of authority in this country is in line with the rule announced in the Wilson Case, supra, to wit, that the defect in the highway need not be the sole cause of the injury, but that if, besides such defect, there be another cause, not attributable to the negligence of the injured person, and which contributed directly to the result, the corporation will still be liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for the defect in the highway.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Some of the cases cited by the learned and indefatigable counsel for the plaintiff are so apt and so strongly illustrate and strengthen the view which we now present that we will quote from some of them: "Where one upon a highway is forced off to the side of the traveled way by the rapidly approaching vehicle, and is injured by falling into an opening upon the side of the traveled way, the negligence, if found, in leaving the opening unguarded, was the proximate cause of the injury." Neidhardt v. City of Minneapolis, 112 Minn. 149, 127 N. W. 494, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 822. In that case the plaintiff, with some companions, was walking at night upon the driveway, and, when upon or near a culvert, an automobile, coming in the opposite direction at a high rate of speed, swerved directly towards them. To avoid the machine, the plaintiff stepped off towards the north and fell into an open drain at the edge of the culvert. A recovery against the city was sustained. "A city is liable for an injury resulting from a defect in the street, negligently allowed to exist, though another cause, such as the fright of plaintiff's horse from a street car, may have concurred in such negligence." Townsend v. City of Joplin, 139 Mo. App. 394, 123 S. W. 474. And see City of Rome v. Davis, 9 Ga. App. 62, 70 S. E. 594. The learned trial judge in his charge strongly and repeatedly instructed the jury that the negligence upon which a recovery could be predicated must be the chief, preponderating, and proximate cause of the injury. He nowhere presented the doctrine of concurrent negligence as applicable to the facts of the case, but seemed to emphasize the view that there could not be a recovery against the city unless under the evidence the jury believed that the unguarded excavation was the sole cause of the plaintiff's injury. If the driver of the automobile in the present case saw the dangerous situation of the plaintiff in relation to the unguarded excavation, and nevertheless, by a violation of the speed ordinance of the city of Savannah, or by any other conduct not willful or so wanton as to be constructively willful, caused the horse to become frightened and to back into the excavation, and if the injury would not have happened but for such conduct on the part of the automobile driver, while such conduct might the driver of the automobile liable as well as the city, yet it would not relieve the city from liability to an innocent person, provided that it was negligence to leave the excavation unguarded, and that this negligence was a concurrent cause of the injury. The concurrent acts of negligence of both wrongdoers would constitute the proximate cause of the injury. We think this doctrine of concurrent negligence was presented by the evidence in this case, and that the learned trial judge erred in refusing to charge in substance this rule in compliance with a written request.

Judgment reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

PIEDMONT HOTEL CO. v. HENDERSON.
(No. 3,177.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 180*)—COMPUTATION OF LIMITATION—COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION—NEW ACTION AFTER DISMISSAL.

Where two or more separate and distinct causes of action are sued on in the same petition, and the plaintiff dismisses from the case certain of the causes of action, he has the right to sue over on the causes of action so dismissed; and, if the new suit be brought within six months from the time of the dismissal, the fact that these causes of action were sued on in the former action may be shown under Civ. Code 1910, § 4381, to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations.

(a) Amendments ordinarily relate back to the beginning of the suit. This rule, however, is not to be so applied as to affect the right to sue over within six months upon causes of action which by amendment were stricken from a case, and which would be barred by the statute of limitations but for the pendency of the suit from which they were so stricken.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—PLEADING.

Ordinarily, where a right or privilege is asserted under court proceedings, it is proper that a copy of the proceedings be set forth in the pleadings or copied as an exhibit, especially if there be special demurrer requiring it. However, the overruling of a special demurrer complaining that a court writing is set forth according to its alleged legal effect, and not by literal copy, will not be considered as harmful error, where the status of the case would be the same whether the writing had the legal effect claimed or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4089-4105; Dec. Dig. § 1040.*]

3. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 22*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING—ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT.

Whoever arrests or imprisons a person without a warrant is guilty of a tort, unless he can justify under some of the exceptions in which arrest and imprisonment without a warrant are permitted by law; and the burden of proving the existence of the facts raising the exception is upon the person making the arrest or inflicting the imprisonment. If authority for the arrest is shown, the presumption is that it was made legally and for a lawful purpose, and the burden of proof is upon the person asserting the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

4. ARREST (§ 63*)—ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT—"IN HIS PRESENCE"—"WITHIN HIS IMMEDIATE KNOWLEDGE."

The words, "in his presence," as used in Pen. Code 1910, § 917, and the words, "within his immediate knowledge," as used in section 921 (both sections relating to arrest without warrant), are synonymous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Cent. Dig. §§ 145-156; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5525-5526.]

5. ARREST (§ 63*)—AUTHORITY TO ARREST—ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT.

The provision in the charter of Atlanta (Acts 1906, p. 616) that policemen of that city may arrest for state offenses, with or without warrant, must be construed in connection with the general law on the subject so as to authorize a policeman of that city to arrest without warrant only when one of the exceptional cases set forth in the general law exists.

6. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 8*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING—ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT.

Whenever an arrest without warrant is made, the officer or person making the arrest must without delay convey the offender before the most convenient magistrate and obtain a warrant. A reasonable time (ordinarily to be determined by the jury) is allowed for the obtaining of the warrant. Imprisonment or detention beyond the reasonable time not only renders the imprisonment or detention illegal, but makes the entire transaction (including the arrest) a trespass ab initio.

(a) The rule that "when entry, authority or license is given to any one by law, and he doth abuse it, he shall be a trespasser ab initio," cited and applied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 68-73; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

7. INSTRUCTIONS—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

The court did not err in instructing the jury on the subject of punitive damages.

8. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 27*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING—CRUEL TREATMENT.

"Cruel treatment of his prisoner by the captor may be considered (where there is evidence on the point) to illustrate the purpose of the arrest and the bona fides of the custody." The rule is applicable where the mother of three young daughters was arrested at night, without warrant, and the person making the arrest refused her request that she be allowed to go to her home, conveniently near by, for the purpose of securing the safety of her daughters, who were without male protection, and imprisoned her for the night without giving her opportunity to communicate with her children.

9. EVIDENCE (§ 314*)—HEARSAY—PROOF OF DEATH.

While in a sense hearsay is admissible to prove death, yet, before the hearsay is admissible for that purpose, it must come up to the requirements of Civ. Code 1910, § 5764, which provides: "Pedigree, including descent, relationship, birth, marriage, and death, may be proved either by the declarations of deceased persons related by blood or marriage, or by general repute in the family, or by genealogies, inscriptions, 'family trees,' and similar evidence."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1171; Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

10. TRIAL (§ 251*)—ACTION—INSTRUCTION—DAMAGES.

The verdict on the second count is reasonable in amount, is well supported by the evidence, and no error affecting it was committed on the trial. The verdict on the first count (in the light of all the facts in the record and the finding of the jury in favor of the defendant on the third count) is very large, if not legally excessive; and in the course of his charge the court gave to the jury a material misdirection as to the character of the damages claimed in that count. The plaintiff is given the option of curing the error by writing off the recovery on the first count, in which event the judgment will stand affirmed; otherwise a new trial results as to the entire case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-595; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

Hill, C. J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Lilly Henderson against the Piedmont Hotel Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed on condition.

The plaintiff was employed as a chambermaid in the Piedmont Hotel in Atlanta. At about 10 o'clock on the night of September 16, 1905, she was suspected of having stolen a purse and a dollar bill from one of the rooms. The manager and assistant manager of the hotel and a special policeman (nominally employed by the city, but in fact employed and paid by the hotel company) confronted her with the alleged theft, and the policeman at the instruction of the other two gentlemen arrested her. The manager consulted with the president of the hotel company, and he directed that she be "locked up." She was carried to the police station and imprisoned there until the next afternoon at 2:30 o'clock, when she was brought before the recorder and bound over to the state court for larceny. Up to this time no warrant had been sworn out, but, upon her being bound over to the state court, a warrant was sworn out by the special policeman, and an accusation thereon was preferred against her in the city court. She was tried and acquitted. On May 27, 1909, the present suit was filed against the hotel company for damages. The petition contains three counts. The first alleges the arrest of the plaintiff without a warrant, and prays for damages, both actual and punitive, for illegal arrest. The second count takes up the transaction following her illegal arrest, alleges her incarceration in the police station without warrant or other lawful authority, and prays for damages, actual and punitive, on account of false imprisonment. The third count sets forth the swearing out of the warrant and the prosecution in the city court, and prays for damages on account of malicious prosecution. Under the petition as drawn, the several counts were employed, not for the purpose of setting forth the same cause of action with a variety of detail, as is frequently done, but for the purpose of dividing the general transaction involved in the arrest, imprisonment, and subsequent prosecution into three separate causes of action. The judge instructed the jury to render a separate verdict on each count. They found in favor of the plaintiff $2,500 damages on the first count (for illegal arrest), and $2,500 on the second count (for false imprisonment), and found in favor of the defendant on the third count (for malicious prosecution). Further facts necessary to an understanding of the points decided will be stated in the course of the opinion.

Smith, Hastings & Ransom, for plaintiff in error. Eb. T. Williams and Westmoreland Bros., for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The first point, and perhaps the most troublesome point in the record, arises upon the defense under the statute of limitations. The present suit was not filed within the statutory period, but the plaintiff relies on section 4831 of the Civil Code of 1910, which is as follows: "If a plaintiff shall be nonsuited, or shall discontinue or dismiss his case, and shall recommence within six months, such renewed case shall stand upon the same footing, as to limitation, with the original case; but this privilege of dismissal and renewal shall be exercised only once under this clause." It is made to appear by the pleadings and the proof that on January 26, 1906, the plaintiff filed in the superior court of Fulton county an action against the present defendant (joining also the manager and the assistant manager of the hotel company, though they were afterwards stricken by amendment). That suit set forth in one count the entire transaction set forth in the three counts of the present suit, and the defendant filed thereto a demurrer on the ground "that the same contains in the same count two separate and distinct causes of action, to wit, a cause of action for false arrest and a cause of action for malicious prosecution." The judge of the superior court sustained this demurrer, but gave leave to amend; and on January

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

28, 1909, the plaintiff filed an amendment to that petition, "striking therefrom any claim for damages on 'a cause of action for false arrest' and electing to pursue the cause of action for malicious prosecution." The case was then assigned to trial, and on March 30, 1909, terminated in a nonsuit. The present suit, it may be recalled, was filed on May 27, 1909; i. e., within six months from the date the former suit was nonsuited, and also within six months from the date on which the plaintiff struck out from the former petition the claim for damages on account of false arrest and imprisonment.

Whether the petition in the former suit did in its one count set forth more than one distinct cause of action is not now a question for determination. The demurrer raising that point and the judgment of the court (unexcepted to) sustaining it make conclusive upon the parties, and upon the court in the trial of the present case, the proposition that the false arrest (including the false imprisonment—for it is manifest from the context that the expression, "false arrest," as used in the quotations from the pleadings in the former case referred to the imprisonment as well as to the arrest) was a separate and distinct cause of action from the alleged malicious prosecution which followed thereon. The fact that we doubt the soundness of that ruling makes no difference. It is now a postulate of the case.

Before deciding the point which controls this branch of the case, we will eliminate another proposition. It may be that the language employed in the amendment to the former suit, by which the plaintiff struck from the petition "any claim for damages" on the cause of action for false arrest, left the allegations as to the false arrest and false imprisonment still in the petition as a part of the transaction declared on as a malicious prosecution. Be that as it may, we will decide the case as if the former petition in its one count set up the three separate and distinct causes of action contained in the different counts of the present petition, and as if on January 28, 1909, the plaintiff struck out two of these causes of action and was on March 30, 1909, nonsuited as to the third.

The point, the very serious point, which counsel for the plaintiff in error (the defendant in the lower court) makes, is that an amendment relates back to the date of the filing of the suit, and that when, on January 28, 1909, the plaintiff amended the petition in the former suit by striking out all causes of action except the one on account of the malicious prosecution, that amendment related back to the beginning of the suit, and left the case as if the petition had been originally brought only for the malicious prosecution; so that, when the case thus proceeding terminated in nonsuit, only a case for malicious prosecution could be renewed within six months thereafter. We believe the true rule to be that, if a petition contains two or more separate and distinct causes of action, each cause of action is to be tried and treated as if it were a separate and distinct case. In many instances the rules of pleading do allow separate and distinct causes of action to be joined in the same petition, though as a matter of technical form and of orderliness of procedure there is a requirement that each shall be set forth in a separate count. Each count, then, from a substantial point of view, is a separate suit; and the case made by the petition as a whole is determined as if separate suits had been filed and had been consolidated for the purposes of trial. For an analogue in criminal procedure, see Tooke v. State, 4 Ga. App. 495, 504, 61 S. E. 917. The requirement that the different causes of action shall be alleged in separate counts is technical only, and, if the case proceeds to trial with the petition asserting two or more distinct causes of action in the same count, the case nevertheless stands as if a number of separate suits were on trial by consolidation. It seems expedient, logical, and altogether just to say that if a plaintiff should file a petition setting forth in separate counts a number of distinct causes of action, and afterwards should find that he was unable satisfactorily to proceed as to one of his counts and should then strike or dismiss that count, the effect would be the same as if he had brought a like number of separate suits, and had dismissed one of them; and that, if the time required by the statute of limitations had been completed after the filing of the suit and before the dismissal of the count, the plaintiff should nevertheless be allowed to sue over upon the cause of action asserted in that count within six months from the time he struck it out or dismissed it. This is merely to give to the code section on the subject of renewal of actions that liberal, common-sense construction which the courts are accustomed to say should be given it. See Cox v. Strickland, 120 Ga. 104 (especially at bottom of page 111 and top of page 112) 47 S. E. 912, and authorities there cited. If by technical delinquency the plaintiff has joined two distinct causes of action in the same count, he should be allowed to strike out or dismiss one of them on like terms, for one of the very objects of the renewal statute is to give the plaintiff the right to sue over without the embarrassment of the bar of the statute of limitations, where in the first suit he attempted to assert a cause of action, but "by some accident, or inadvertence or variance, not affecting the real merits of the case, was compelled to dismiss." Moss v. Kessler, 60 Ga. 44, 47. That the right to claim the benefit of the statute may apply as to a part of a case only (if that part relates to a distinct and entire cause of action) is shown by Civ. Code 1910, § 4382, where it is given to a defendant whose plea of set-off has been disposed of without a hearing on the merits. In our opinion the rule insisted upon by able counsel for the plaintiff in error, that amendments relate back to the beginning of the suit, does not destroy this right of renewal in cases such as those we have been discussing. The prime object of the rule is the saving of causes of action, not the destroying of them. It is a general rule, but it has its exceptions. When an amendment merely perfects, either in form or in substance, the manner in which a particular cause of action has been stated, it relates back to the beginning of the suit, so far as that cause of action is concerned, and makes the procedural perfection finally attained as to that cause of action a perfection ab initio; but there are cases into which new and distinct causes of action are inserted by amendment (though the contrary is the general rule, of course), and in such cases the amendment does not relate back, and the causes of action contained in the petition prior to the introduction of the new cause of action are in no wise affected. Cf. Bentley v. Crummeys, 119 Ga. 911, 47 S. E. 209.

The amendment involved in this case was twofold in its consequences. As to the allegations respecting the cause of action for malicious prosecution, it fulfilled the proper offices of an amendment—i. e., it relieved the statement of that cause of action of the procedural imperfection of being joined in the same count with the statement of another cause of action—and as to that cause of action it related back to the beginning of the case, and made the perfection attained as to it a perfection ab initio. But as to the cause of action for the false arrest it operated quite differently. As to the statement of that cause of action, it was no amendment at all, but was a dismissal; and dismissals do not relate back to the beginning of the suit, at least so far as counting time under the code section as to renewals of actions is concerned. We are of the opinion that the trial court properly held that the plaintiff's causes of action, so far as the questioned counts are concerned, were not barred. In holding this we think that we are applying the rule on the subject according to its reason as so ably set forth by Mr. Justice Lamar in the case of Cox v. Strickland, 120 Ga. 104, 109, 47 S. E. 912, 915: "Statutes of limitation are based partly on the theory that nonaction by a plaintiff tends to throw his adversary off guard, making him careless in the preservation of receipts, vouchers, documents, and other evidence needful for his defense. But when a suit is pending, whether it be brought with technical correctness or not, the defendant is warned to preserve his evidence. The attempted assertion by judicial proceedings of a cause of action in which A. gives B. notice of his claim is sufficient to stop the running of the statute during the pendency of that suit, and for six months thereafter. In like manner, if B. in the same suit, by a set-off or cross-bill (Civil Code 1895, § 3787 [Civil Code, 1910, § 4382]; Crane v. Barry, 60 Ga. 362; Hunt v. Spaulding, 18 Pick. [Mass.] 521), or other appropriate proceeding, should attempt to enforce his cause of action against the plaintiff or other party to the proceedings, the statute would likewise be tolled as to his claim. Notice had been given. The opposite party was warned. If the suit was disposed of on any matter not concluding the merits of the cause of action, or any [italics ours] of the causes of action, asserted in the proceeding by one party against another, it might be thereafter seasonably renewed in the proper forum, in proper form, against any of the proper and all of the necessary parties therein." See, also, Atlanta, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Wilson, 119 Ga. 781, 47 S. E. 366.

[2] 2. Another exception involving somewhat of the general question we have just been discussing will now be noticed. The plaintiff in alleging the proceedings had in the former suit for the purpose of showing that the present action was not barred did not set forth verbatim a copy of the amendment of January 28, 1909, by which the cause of action as to the arrest and imprisonment was stricken out, but stated the substance of it in the following language: "The plaintiff filed an amendment striking from said suit any claim for damages on a cause of action for false arrest." The defendant filed special demurrer to this, on the ground that a copy of this amendment was not attached; and exception is taken to the overruling of the special demurrer. Counsel for the plaintiff in error cites Atlanta, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Wilson, 119 Ga. 781, 47 S. E. 366, in which it is held that, "if the point be raised by special demurrer, the plaintiff, who relies on the privilege of renewal under Civ. Code 1895, § 3786 [Civil Code, 1910, § 4381], to escape the bar of the statute, may be required to attach a copy of the petition in the first suit, so that the court may determine as matter of law whether it was for the same cause of action as the second between the same parties brought before the original bar had attached, and in a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter." The petition in the former action was set forth by exhibit in the case at bar, and the allegation attacked by the demurrer merely stated what became of that case so far as the particular cause of action is concerned. We doubt that the reason underlying the rule as announced in the case just cited applies with full vigor here. At any rate, the allegation under the facts of the present case stood in such an immaterial relation that any error in respect to its sufficiency was harmless; for, whether the pleader correctly stated the substance and legal effect of his amendment or incorrectly stated it, the case was unaffected. That is to say, if the amendment alleged by the pleader was not adequate to dismiss the cause of action as to false arrest from the case, then it remained in, and fell by nonsuit in March, 1909, and was on that account renewable. If the amendment was adequate to effect the dismissal, the case was nevertheless renewable, for six months had not expired from the date of the amendment.

[3] 3. The jury, as has been said, found in favor of the defendant as to the third count (for malicious prosecution). Hence, only errors relating to the manner in which the other two counts were submitted to the jury will be considered. There is no dispute that the arrest and imprisonment complained of in the other two counts took place without any warrant being procured. Whoever arrests or imprisons a person without a warrant is guilty of a tort, unless he can justify under one of the exceptions prescribed by law; and the burden of proving that the case lies within the exception rests upon the person making the arrest or inflicting the imprisonment. White v. State, 99 Ga. 16 (3), 19, 26 S. E. 742, 37 L. R. A. 642. If a warrant is shown authorizing the arrest, the presumption is that the arrest was made legally and for a lawful purpose, and the burden of proof is upon the person asserting the contrary. Graham v. Marks, 98 Ga. 67, 70, 25 S. E. 981.

[4] 4. The circumstances under which an arrest without warrant may be made by an officer are set forth in section 917 of the Penal Code (1910) (which section is a codification of the common law, with slight enlargement), as follows: "An arrest may be made for a crime by an officer, either under a warrant, or without a warrant if the offense is committed in his presence, or the offender is endeavoring to escape, or for other cause there is likely to be a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant." This applies to arrests for misdemeanors as well as for felonies, though as to arrests for felonies somewhat greater latitude may be allowed in certain cases. Porter v. State, 124 Ga. 297, 302, 52 S. E. 283, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730; Thompson v. State, 4 Ga. App. 649 (2), 652, 62 S. E. 99. In this case the crime charged was a misdemeanor. There is no contention that the alleged offender was endeavoring to escape, or that for any other cause there was likely to be a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant. The only ground of justification left was that the crime was committed in the officer's presence. Complaint is made as to the court's instructions to the jury as to when a crime may be considered as having been committed in an officer's presence. There are other assignments of error bearing on the same general subject. (Were it not for the contingency that there may be another trial of the case, it would be unnecessary for us to pass upon these questions, in view of what we are going to rule a little later on in the course of the opinion.) We think that the words, "in his presence," as used in Pen. Code 1910, § 917, and the words "within his immediate knowledge," as used in Pen. Code 1910, § 921, are synonymous. To justify the arrest without warrant, the officer need not see the act which constitutes the crime take place, if by any of his senses he has personal knowledge of its commission. Thus, if he hears shooting or other noises, and runs immediately to the place and finds the offender with evidences of the alleged crime on him, or finds the offender running away as if in apparent flight from the crime, and in similar cases, the crime is considered as having been committed in the officer's presence or immediate knowledge. See the dissent in Porter v. State, 124 Ga. 297, 52 S. E. 283, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730, and cases therein cited.

[5] 5. It is said, however, that policemen in Atlanta have broader powers than ordinary officers as to making arrests, because it is provided in the charter of Atlanta (Acts 1905, p. 616) as to the police officers of the city that "It shall be their duty to make arrests of any persons violating the ordinances of said city, with or without summons, and also with or without warrants; they shall likewise make arrests of any persons who have violated the statutes of said state, and their arrests for such violations are hereby authorized, either with or without warrants therefor." The general law as embodied in Pen. Code 1910, § 917, applies to policemen of all the municipalities of the state. Thomas v. State, 91 Ga. 204, 206, 18 S. E. 305; Brooks v. State, 114 Ga. 6, 39 S. E. 877; Porter v. State, 124 Ga. 297, 302, 52 S. E. 283, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730; Johnson v. State, 30 Ga. 426. Unless the local law as found in the Atlanta charter is construed in such a way as to make it harmonious with the general law, the local law would fall as being unconstitutional. A construction which avoids repugnancy to the Constitution is always to be favored. With this in view we construe the provision in the Atlanta charter as authorizing policemen of that city to make arrests without warrant only where such a course is permissible under the general law. The language of the local law is easily susceptible of this construction, and the ordinary canons of interpretation require the limitation here imposed upon it.

[6] 6. Even if we should find that the court erred in any of his instructions as to the legality of the arrest, there is a reason why the error should be considered as harmless and insufficient to authorize a new trial. Pen. Code 1910, § 922, provides: "In every case of arrest without warrant, the person arresting shall, without delay, convey the offender before the most convenient officer authorized to receive an affidavit and issue a warrant. And no such imprisonment shall be legal beyond a reasonable time allowed for this purpose." Though it would probably do no violence to the prerogative of the jury as to passing on the facts for us to say that the evidence in this case demanded a finding that the defendants did not comply with this law, still it is unnecessary for us to do so. What is a reasonable time for the detention after the arrest in order to procure a warrant is generally speaking a question for the jury; and in this case the question was fairly submitted to the jury, and by their verdict on the second count they have established the fact that the plaintiff was imprisoned for an unreasonable time before the warrant was procured. This being so, another proposition of law comes into play. One of the resolutions in the case of The Six Carpenters, 8 Coke, 146 (1 Smith's Leading Cases, 9th Ed. 261), cited approvingly in Sheftall v. Zipperer, 133 Ga. 488, 492, 66 S. E. 253, 255 (27 L. R. A. [N. S.] 442), is that "when entry, authority or license is given to any one by law, and he doth abuse it, he shall be a trespasser ab initio." This has been frequently applied to cases of arrest prima facie legal, followed by illegal detention. In the case of Brock v. Stimson, 108 Mass. 520, 11 Am. Rep. 390, the policeman legally arrested the plaintiff without a warrant, but failed in the duty of carrying him before the magistrate. The court in an opinion by Mr. Justice Gray held: "Every man has the right to the enjoyment of his liberty and the use of his property, except so far as restrained by law and whoever unlawfully interferes with the enjoyment of the one, or the use of the other, is a trespasser. A man who seizes the property or arrests the person of another by legal process, or other equivalent authority conferred upon him by law, can only justify himself by a strict compliance with the requirements of such process or authority. If he fails to execute or return the process as thereby required, he may not, perhaps, in the strictest sense be said to become a trespasser ab initio, but he is often called such, for his whole justification falls, and he stands as if he had never had any authority to take the property, and therefore appears to have been a trespasser from the beginning. 2 Rol. Ab. 563; Shorland v. Govett, 5 B. & C. 485; s. c., 8 D. & R. 257; Smith v. Gates, 21 Pick. [Mass.] 55; Coffin v. Vincent, 12 Cush. [Mass.] 98; Russell v. Hanscomb, 15 Gray [Mass.] 166; Munroe v. Merrill, 6 Gray [Mass.] 236; Williams v. Babbitt, 14 Gray [Mass.] 141 [74 Am. Dec. 670]. The same rule holds good in the case of an officer who, after arresting a person on criminal process, omits to perform the duty required by the law, of taking him before a court. Tubbs v. Tukey, 3 Cush. [Mass.] 438 [50 Am. Dec. 744]." See, also, Boston & Maine R. v. Small, 85 Me. 462, 27 A. 349, 35 Am. St. Rep. 379; Dehn v. Hinman, 56 Conn. 320, 15 A. 741, 1 L. R. A. 374. Hence it is immaterial to inquire whether the officer could have arrested without a warrant if he had thereafter obeyed the provisions of Pen. Code 1910, § 922, for his legally ascertained disobedience of this law relates back so as to make the arrest in any event illegal.

[7] 7. The point is made that the court erred in submitting to the jury instructions on the subject of punitive damages. Without going into the details of the evidence, we will dispose of the exception with the statement that this issue was presented by the evidence as well as by the pleadings, and was properly submitted to the jury.

[8] 8. Complaint is made that the court allowed the plaintiff to prove that at the time of her arrest at night and her imprisonment she had at home three young daughters without male protection. Taken in connection with the testimony that the defendants' agents were informed of this fact, and were requested by the plaintiff to take her by her home for the purpose of making some provision for the safety of these children, and that the request was refused (though her home was near by), the evidence was plainly admissible, not only for the purpose of showing the extent of the plaintiff's mental suffering, but also for the purpose of showing malice and wanton oppression on the part of the defendant. "Cruel treatment of his prisoner by the captor may be considered (where there is evidence on the point) to illustrate the purpose of the arrest and the bona fides of the custody." Habersham v. State, 56 Ga. 61 (5).

[9] 9. The defendant desired to prove the death of two persons connected with the case, a Miss Scott and the policeman, Carson. A witness was asked, "Have you heard from any member or members of Miss Scott's family whether or not she is dead?" The witness answered, "I had a letter from her sister." The court ruled this out. "As the record does not disclose what was in the letter or what the defendant expected to show by the letter, it is not necessary to consider this exception further. As to Carson, the witness testified: 'W. W. Carson was a member of the police force, and there was public announcement of his death, and my officer at the hotel told me of his death, and told me he attended his funeral, but I have no personal knowledge of it.' The court ruled this out. Civ. Code 1910, § 5764, provides: 'Pedigree, including descent, relationship, birth, marriage, and death, may be proved either by the declarations of deceased persons related by blood or marriage, or by general repute in the family, or by genealogies, inscriptions, 'family trees,' and similar evidence.' In Imboden v. Etowah Co., 70 Ga. 86, it was held in general language that hearsay as to death is admissible. In Williams v. State, 86 Ga. 548, 550, 12 S. E. 743, the generality of this statement was criticised. While, in a sense, hearsay is admissible to prove death, yet the hearsay must come up to the requirements of the code section quoted above. Cf. Augusta R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, 11 S. E. 706 (3). See, also, Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 12 S. E. 18 (10). The evidence was properly excluded.

[10] 10. We come now to the only error

we find in the entire record. The first count sets up that by the false arrest the plaintiff was greatly humiliated and damaged in her feelings and reputation, and mentions no other element of damage (except punitive damages). The second count sets up that by the false imprisonment which ensued after the arrest, and by the circumstances connected with it, she was "greatly humiliated and made sick, and nearly lost her reason, and her nervous system was so shocked that for over two weeks she was prostrated from the effects thereof, from which she has never recovered." We need not recite what is set up in the third count, as the verdict was for the defendant as to that. The court in his charge to the jury, in stating the contentions of the parties, took up the counts of the plaintiff's petition, and read them to the jury separately. Then, after stating the substance of the pleas in the case, he stated to the jury what facts were conceded by both parties to be true as to each of the counts. He then stated the contested issues, arising under each count, and gave to the jury the rules of law by which these contested issues were to be settled. As he concluded his instructions as to the contests under each count, he added: "I will instruct you as to the amount of the recovery later, on this proposition, if she is entitled to recover at all." After he had finished with the other portions of his charge and approached the question of damages, he made the following statement to the jury: "Now, she sets up, gentlemen, she suffered damage on each of these counts to which I have called your attention, for humiliation and for her wounded feelings, for her suffering mental and physical, for her disgrace amongst her friends and people who knew her, and humiliation, and that it affected her nervous system so that she suffered a nervous shock for two weeks or more, and asks to recover damages, laying her damages on each one of the counts at $10,000. Well, gentlemen, the same rule or measure of damage would apply on each of these counts, and it is left to the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors to say what the amount of damages would be, if she recovers in the case. It would be your duty to look into the character of wrong done her, if she was wronged, in each count; what effect it had as to causing her humiliation; what its tendency was as to disgracing her before the public, amongst her friends; and, desiring to be fair and just to both sides and not oppressive to the defendant, you would give to her such sum as you believe would compensate her, under the circumstances, for her pain and her suffering, her humiliation, her mental suffering, if she underwent such suffering, and such sum as your enlightened consciences would approve as right and just under the facts and circumstances of the case." Then, after instructions on the subject of punitive damages, he charged the jury as to the form of their verdict, directing them to make a separate finding as to each count. The verdict was: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff twenty-five hundred dollars on count No. 1, and twenty-five hundred dollars on count No. 2, making a total five thousand dollars."

The error complained of is that the court instructed the jury in effect that under the first count, as well as under the second, they might award damages to the plaintiff for the physical suffering (including the shock to her nervous system) which she experienced through her illness which she claimed was brought about by the false imprisonment, though no such damages were claimed or alleged in the first count. The point seems to be well taken. While it is true that the court correctly read the plaintiff's petition and the various counts thereof to the jury, still, as he was repeatedly reminding them throughout the charge that he would inform them later as to how they should assess the damages in the event they found the defendant liable, and did at the close of the charge give these erroneous instructions, we cannot say that the jury was not misled. There is a possibility that the jurors decided that the plaintiff ought to have $5,000 for the wrong done her by the false arrest and imprisonment, considered as one continuous and connected transaction, and that, having agreed on this amount, they proceeded to divide it into two parts, in order to comply with the directions of the judge as to the form of their verdict, but as judges we have no right to assume that they did any such thing; for under the law and under the charge of the court it was their duty to consider and to find as to each count separately. If the plaintiff had not divided the transaction into parts and made each part a separate cause of action, there would be no trouble in sustaining the verdict, but the fact that confronts us is that the division exists. Under all the facts of the case, the false imprisonment was a much more serious cause of damage than the false arrest. The point is made that $2,500 for the false arrest alone is excessive. It will not be necessary for us to make an authoritative ruling on that point. However, in the light of the decision in the case of Fire Association v. Fleming, 78 Ga. 733, 3 S. E. 420, in which Mr. Justice Hall denounced the verdict of $1,000 for an arrest without warrant as so excessive as to show bias or misapprehension on the part of the jury, there is much plausibility in the point. It must be kept in mind that the verdict of the jury on the third count is in effect a finding that probable cause existed for a prosecution of the plaintiff, though it was afterwards ascertained that she was not guilty. If there was probable cause for a prosecution, there was reasonable ground for an arrest. The verdict, taken as a whole, must be construed as finding that the actionable wrong which the defendant committed, so far as the first count is concerned, was not in causing her to be arrested, but in not getting a warrant. The arrest was in private, and, standing alone, was not accompanied by specially aggravating circumstances. If the jury believed the plaintiff's version of the case, the damages assessed are very moderate so far as the second count is concerned; but this is not true as to the first count. As to the second count, the case was fairly and legally tried throughout; as to the first count, there is an error of serious import. We make this statement in explanation of the direction we are about to give the case. We are of the opinion that the proper disposition of the case, under all the circumstances, is to affirm the judgment on condition that the plaintiff will voluntarily write off the recovery had on the first count, thus relieving the case of all effects of the error, but that otherwise a new trial be had of the case as a whole.

Judgment affirmed on condition.

RUSSELL, J. (specially concurring). In concurring in the judgment of the court in this case, and as to the point passed on in the tenth division of the opinion, I do not wish to be understood, even in the light of Judge Hall's decision in Fire Association v. Fleming, 78 Ga. 733, 3 S. E. 420, as agreeing to the proposition that the verdict upon the first count was excessive. I conceive it to be the right of the jury to fix an amount even as large as that of the verdict upon that count, for the damages resulting upon an unlawful arrest, if the attendant circumstances in a particular case authorized such an exercise of their discretion. But in view of the fact that the ruling of the trial court in the previous litigation was not excepted to, and thereby becomes the law of this case, this court, as well as the lower court, is bound to the proposition that the transaction dealt with in the plaintiff's petition cannot be considered as one continuing cause of action, but must be treated as three causes of action entirely separate and distinct.

HILL, C. J. (dissenting). I concur in all of the views so clearly and forcibly expressed by Judge POWELL in his opinion for the majority of the court, except as to that portion embraced in the tenth division of the opinion and the tenth headnote. After a most careful consideration of the evidence and the charge of the learned trial judge referred to and discussed by Judge POWELL, I do not think that the charge relating to the damages on the first count contained a material error which in any manner misled or confused the jury; nor do I think that this court can say under the facts that the amount of the verdict found on this count was excessive, and I therefore cannot concur in the conclusion of the majority of the court that the verdict rendered on this first count in behalf of the plaintiff should be written off under penalty of another trial. The petition contained three counts. The first count claimed damages for the illegal arrest. The second count claimed damages resulting from false imprisonment following this illegal arrest, and the third count claimed damages for the malicious prosecution following the illegal arrest and false imprisonment; all three of the counts laying the amount of the damages at the arbitrary sum of $10,000. The damages resulting to the plaintiff from each one of the wrongful acts complained of, to wit, the illegal arrest, the false imprisonment, and the malicious prosecution, seem to me to be substantially the same, although there may have been some greater elaboration of these grounds in the second and third counts than in the first count. But, after all, considered from a reasonable and practical viewpoint, it seems to me that the character and extent of the damages claimed for each one of the three wrongful acts complained of do not substantially vary; and it is altogether reasonable to conclude that the jury, in considering the question of damages, did not make any very critical analysis of each character of the damages flowing from each separate wrongful act or make a concrete application to each count, but in all probability considered all the wrongs complained of as one continuing tort, and endeavored by the verdict to compensate the plaintiff for all the wrongs for which they found the defendant was responsible.

It is insisted that the former rulings of the superior court, acquiesced in by both parties, that the proper legal procedure was to separate the items of damages into counts, was binding upon the court and the jury, and that the jury were therefore compelled to consider each question separately, and to award damages appropriate to each separate count, and not give a lump sum for all the acts complained of. This may be the sound legal view, but I have no idea that the jury, in fixing the amount of damages, were very greatly influenced by this technical view of legal pleading. It is said by Judge POWELL that the judge committed an error which may have misled the jury, in that he instructed them on the first count that they might consider certain elements of damages not claimed as grounds of damages in that count, but which were contained in the second and third counts, and that this instruction may have led the jury to give too large a verdict on the first count for the unlawful arrest. The judge charged as follows on the question of damages: "Now, she sets up, gentlemen, she suffered damages on each of these counts to which I have called your attention, for humiliation and for her wounded feelings, for her suffering mental and physical, for her disgrace amongst her friends and people who knew her, and humiliation, and that it affected her nervous system so that she suffered a nervous shock for two weeks or more, and asks to recover damages, laying her damages on each one of the counts at $10,000. Well, gentlemen, the same rule or measure of damages would apply on each one of these counts, and it is left to the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors to say what the amount of damages would be, if she recovers in the case. It would be your duty to look into the character of the wrong done her, if she was wronged, in each count; what effect it had as to causing her suffering; what effect as to causing her humiliation; what its tendency was as to disgracing her before the public, amongst her friends, and then desiring to be fair," etc. I think the learned trial judge, in thus summing up all the grounds of damages which the jury were authorized to consider, was really making a summary of all the damages claimed in the three counts, and did not intend to make a distinct and separate statement of the grounds of damages set out in each of the separate counts. It would probably have been more accurate for him to have separated the items of damages claimed on each count. But I cannot bring my mind to believe that because he summed up all the damages that he thereby confused the issues submitted to the jury or misled them into giving too large an amount on the first count. Of course, the statement made by the learned judge that the measure of damages on each count was the same was correct; the measure being the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors. It must be conceded that the plaintiff was entitled to some damages under the verdict of the jury on the first count for the illegal arrest. This first count sets up that by the illegal arrest the plaintiff was "greatly humiliated and damaged in her feelings and reputation," but mentions no other element of damage, except punitive damage. In considering the evidence applicable to this count and the resulting damage from the wrong complained of, the allegations permit a very broad scope to the jury. How much was she entitled to for the illegal arrest? She says it greatly humiliated her and damaged her feelings and reputation. If she was entitled to any damages for the false imprisonment, she certainly was entitled to damages for the illegal arrest. Not only could the jury under this first count give her damages as compensation for wounded feelings and humiliation, but they were also authorized on this count to give punitive damages. I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that the $2,500 found under this count under the allegations and the proof (even when considered in connection with the allegations of this count only), was excessive.

I do not concur in the statement in the opinion that the verdict of the jury on the third count necessarily found that, while the arrest was illegal, it was not malicious. There was a contention—in fact, one of the principal defenses relied on as to the third count was—that the prosecution of the plaintiff was not by authority of the defendant, but that the case was prosecuted without its consent and without its authority, and the judge very properly instructed the jury as to this question that, before they could find a verdict for the plaintiff on this count, they must find by a preponderance of the evidence that the prosecution was without probable cause, was malicious, and was by authority of the defendant. It is not beyond the evidence to conclude that the jury may have thought that the prosecution was both malicious and without probable cause, yet that the defendant was not responsible for the prosecution, and was not liable on this count. The decision in the Fleming Case, 78 Ga., 3 S. E., cited by Judge Powell, and by Judge Russell in his specially concurring opinion, I think does not furnish legitimate ground for holding that the verdict on the first count in this case, under the allegations of damages in that count, was in any sense excessive. I might dispose of the point by stating that the justice who wrote the opinion in that case was simply expressing his personal view on the amount of the verdict. He did not speak for the court, for that question was not an issue in the case. The facts in that case did not show that the plaintiff was actually arrested, but showed that his arrest was constructive, and was attended with no element whatever of aggravation, either in the act or intention, and it may have been true that under the facts of that case $1,000 was excessive. In the present case there was an actual arrest without a warrant. The verdict found that there was great humiliation and damage to the feelings of the plaintiff. Judge POWELL justly says that there were certain facts of aggravation which the jury might well have considered on the question of punitive damages, to wit, the refusal of the defendant or its agent to permit the plaintiff to go to her home, where she had three small female children, to make necessary provision for their protection while she was under arrest and away from them. To sum the whole matter up, and without extending this discussion, which is necessarily without profit, save as a matter of personal satisfaction to the judge who renders the dissent, I do not think the charge complained of was so confusing and misleading as to demand that the plaintiff write off the amount of the verdict on this count or take the risk of total loss of compensation for the wrongs done her; and I certainly think that under the facts of the case we cannot say that the verdict was excessive under the first count, in view of the very broad latitude which the law gives to the jury in determining the amount of damages of this character.

RUSSELL v. CAMP. (No. 3,202.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 68*)—CONSTRUCTION—SUBJECT-MATTER.

Where an executory agreement for the future delivery of goods is entered into, and there is no stipulation that the goods to be delivered shall be derived from a particular source, the legal effect of the agreement is for the delivery of any goods of that class and quantity, no matter from what source produced. But if the parties expressly stipulate that the goods shall be produced from a particular source, this stipulation of the contract is to be given effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 184-186; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

2. SALES (§ 71*)—CONSTRUCTION—AMOUNT OF GOODS.

Where parties enter into a contract whereby one agrees to sell and the other to buy a designated amount of cotton, stated in the contract as being a portion of a particular crop then in existence, a condition is implied (unless the contrary is stated) that delivery of the specified amount is to be required only in the event the designated crop yields that amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 189-196; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

3. SALES (§ 164*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—QUANTITY DELIVERED.

Where an executory contract for the sale of cotton specifies that the cotton mentioned is a part of a crop in existence, and it turns out that by no fault of the seller the designated crop yields less than the number of bales stated, and the seller delivers all of the cotton produced from his crop, he discharges his contract, and is not liable in damages for failing to deliver the total number of bales stated in the contract.

Error from City Court of Jefferson; W. W. Stark, Judge.

Action by A. A. Camp against W. J. Russell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

T. J. Shackelford and Lewis O. Russell, for plaintiff in error. G. A. Johns, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Camp sued Russell, alleging that during the summer of 1909 they made certain contracts by which Russell had agreed to sell and deliver to Camp a designated number of bales of cotton at various times during the fall of that year; that he delivered only a portion of it, and failed to deliver the remainder; and that the contract price was less than the market price, whereby the amount of damages sued for resulted to the plaintiff. The contracts were evidently written in the same printed form as that which is set out in full in the case of Luke v. Livingston, 9 Ga. App. 116, 70 S. E. 596; but the point made in that case, as to the illegality of the contract, is not here involved. The defendant in the present case admits the legality of the contracts, and expressly sets up that, instead of their being speculative in their nature, they were intended to represent an actual sale of growing cotton which he then and there possessed; but, as he further pleads, when the cotton was gathered, the number of bales turned out to be less than the number designated in the contracts, and he delivered to the plaintiff all of his cotton, with the exception of a few bales, as to which he has settled with the plaintiff. The court struck this defense, and this action of the court is the basis of the exception relied on in this court.

[1] The case of Forsyth Mfg. Co. v. Castlen, 112 Ga. 199, 37 S. E. 485, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28, settles many of the preliminary propositions involved in the case. In that case it is held: "An executory agreement for the sale of goods to be delivered at a future day is valid, though at the time the seller has not the goods in his possession, has not contracted to purchase them, and has no expectation of acquiring them otherwise than by producing, manufacturing, or purchasing them at some time before the day of delivery. Such a transaction is not rendered invalid by the provisions of section 3537 of the Civil Code of 1895 [Civil Code 1910, § 4117], unless it is made to appear that neither of the parties contemplated an actual delivery of the goods, and that it was the intention of both that there should be no actual delivery, but that on the day fixed for delivery there should be a settlement of their differences, based on the market value of the goods on that day. In that event the transaction would be a pure speculation upon chances, but not otherwise. * * * Although at the time an executory agreement for the future delivery of goods was entered into the seller intended to fulfill his contract by delivery of goods produced by him, and this fact was known to the buyer, the seller would have a right to deliver, and the buyer would be bound to receive, any goods of the character and quality stipulated in the contract, when it was not agreed that the goods delivered must be produced by the seller. In determining whether an executory agreement for the future delivery of cotton was valid, as one in which an actual delivery of cotton was contemplated, or whether the transaction was a pure speculation on chances, evidence that the seller was a producer of cotton, and had at the date of the agreement cotton planted and growing, was relevant. An executory agreement for the future delivery of goods of a specified class and quality is, in legal effect, an agreement for the delivery of any goods of that class and quality, no matter where made or by whom produced; and when such an agreement is reduced to writing, parol evidence is not admissible to show that there was a collateral agreement between the parties that the goods specified in the contract should be produced by the seller."

In that case the written contract was silent upon the point as to whether the cotton mentioned in the contract was to be raised by the proposed seller or not. Merely so many bales of cotton of a certain grade were called for. The buyer refused to take certain bales of cotton that were tendered to him, on the ground that they were not raised upon the lands of the seller, and alleged that there was a contemporaneous parol contract that the cotton was to be raised upon the seller's land. The court held that the evidence as to the parol contract could not be received to add to or vary the writing, and that the buyer was liable for refusing to take the cotton when tendered to him. In the case at bar, while the contract does in one of its clauses, in general terms, call for a designated number of bales of cotton of a certain grade and weight, it is specified, in another part of the contract, that "the above number of bales of cotton represents the crop or a part of the crop of the party of the second part for the present year." The point here insisted on is that this written contract itself shows that the parties did not have in contemplation an executory sale of cotton generally, but an executory sale of all or a part of a specified crop of cotton then growing.

[2, 3] We think that the court erred in striking the defense. The parties seem to have deliberately put into the contract the clause which provides that the cotton mentioned therein was specific cotton, or, as the contract itself says, "represents the crop or a part of the crop" of the seller. The court, in construing the contract, must naturally give some meaning to this provision. It was doubtless inserted for the purpose of shutting off any contention that the contract related to a mere speculation in cotton futures, and to confine its terms to a subject-matter as to which the parties, the one a cotton planter and the other a cotton buyer, could legitimately and without question deal, namely, the growing crop of cotton of the planter. While it is true that the parties might have made a valid contract by which the one should sell to the other cotton for future delivery other than the then growing crop of the planter, provided that they bona fide contemplated that the seller would procure by purchase or otherwise the actual cotton in fulfillment of his contract, nevertheless, since all such contracts are looked upon by the courts with critical eyes, and are so frequently subject to avoidance upon impeaching the bona fides of the alleged intent to deliver actual cotton, it is most natural that the parties should seek to specify in advance exactly what cotton they have in contemplation, and to designate definitely from what source it shall be procured. The parties seem to have done this in the present instance. The contract may be fairly interpreted as meaning that the one party undertook to sell to the other so many bales of the cotton which it was expected that his crop would yield.

We think the contract should be construed just as if it had said that Russell sold to Camp "10 bales of cotton out of his present crop." Thus construed, the case falls within the ruling in the leading case of Howell v. Coupland, L. R. 9 Q. B. 462, 1 Q. B. D. 258. In that case Coupland agreed to sell to Howell "200 tons of Regent potatoes grown on land belonging to said Robert Coupland in Whaplode," at a certain price, for delivery during the months of September and October. At the time of making the contract, Coupland had 68 acres of his farm at Whaplode devoted to the growing of potatoes, a portion of which was then sown, and the remainder of which was sown in due course. The crop yielded only 80 tons, which were delivered, and Howell sued to recover damages for the nondelivery of the residue of the 200 tons. The Court of Queen's Bench entered judgment in favor of the defendant, and this was affirmed in the Court of Appeals. The present case is even stronger, for here the crop was not only sown, but was approaching maturity, at the time of the sale, thus making even more irresistible the construction that a particular crop of cotton, and not cotton generally, was in the contemplation of the parties at the time they entered into the contract. We hold that delivery of the entire crop fulfilled the contract. To the same effect, see Ontario Fruit Ass'n v. Cutting Packing Co., 134 Cal. 21, 66 Pac. 28, 53 L. R. A. 681, 86 Am. St. Rep. 231. (Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 441*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1277-1283; Dec. Dig. § 441.*]

2. SALES (§ 355*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—SCOPE OF ISSUES—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

A plea of total failure of consideration includes within its terms the defense of partial failure of consideration, but the defendant can have no abatement from the purchase price on account of a partial failure of consideration, unless he furnishes to the jury sufficient data to enable them to estimate with reasonable certainty the amount of the abatement.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO INSTRUCT.

The court having charged the jury that, unless the defendants sustained their plea of total failure of consideration, there should be a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for, and the jury having returned a verdict in favor of the defendants, the plaintiff will not be allowed to complain that the court did not submit instructions to the jury on the subject of partial failure of consideration.

4. SALES (§ 358*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where the purchase price of an article is represented by a series of promissory notes, and a plea of failure of consideration is filed, evidence is usually admissible to show that one or more of the series of notes has been paid.

5. SALES (§ 358*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where a note given for the purchase price of a horse is sued on and the defendant pleads failure of consideration, evidence is admissible to show that the keep of the horse was worth more than the services he was capable of performing.

6. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERIENCE OF WITNESS.

One who had long experience in the handling of horses, and who had had under his observation for several months the attempts of a certain stallion to beget colts, was properly allowed, after stating his experience and the results of his observation, to give his opinion that the particular stallion was not a satisfactory and sure breeder.

7. OTHER ASSIGNMENTS OVERRULED.

The other errors assigned are without merit.

8. SALES (§ 364*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—INSTRUCTION.

In an action on one of a series of notes for the purchase price of a stallion the failure to instruct as to a provision in the contract that, if the buyers would insure the horse, the seller would, for the amount of the insurance, replace the horse, in case he died, with another of the same kind and value, was not error, where the court did not submit the issue which the defendants sought to raise that there should be an abatement of the purchase price because the horse had died.

Error from City Court of Miller County; M. C. Edwards, Judge.

Action by J. Crouch & Son against J. I. Spooner and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

See, also, 8 Ga. App. 626, 69 S. E. 1129.

Russell & Custer and Bush & Stapleton, for plaintiffs in error. W. I. Geer and P. D. Rich, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiffs sued on a promissory note. The defendants pleaded that the note sued on was one of a series of notes given for the purchase price of a stallion; that the plaintiffs had warranted the stallion to be a sure and satisfactory breeder, and that this warranty had failed and the stallion was totally worthless; also, that the stallion had been sold only conditionally, and that by a parol agreement the plaintiffs had reserved title until payment of the purchase money, and that without fault of the defendants the stallion died. In order to eliminate from a further discussion of the case the feature of defense by which the reservation of the title in the plaintiff and the death of the horse is asserted, it may be here stated that this issue was not submitted to the jury. We presume that the trial judge cut this issue out of the case because of the fact that there was a written contract between the parties which set up stipulations inconsistent with those of the alleged parol agreement. One of these writings (attached as an exhibit to one of the defendants' pleas) asserts a direct sale upon an express warranty. Another writing connected with the contract, as appearing in the evidence, provides that, if the defendants will insure the life of the horse in a designated company for the sum of $1,200, the plaintiffs will for that sum in the event the horse dies replace it with another of the same kind and value.

[1] We think that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the plea of breach of warranty and failure of consideration. It was shown that out of 36 consecutive mares served by the stallion in the usual manner only five became with foal. The condition of the mares as to fertility, the manner in which they were served by the stallion, the method in which the stallion was treated, and a number of similar matters were detailed at length to the jury by the witnesses, and we are not in a position to say that the jury erred in finding that the stallion was wholly valueless, at least to the extent that his services were not worth the amount it took to keep him.

[2] 2. The plaintiffs contend that the court erred in not submitting to the jury instructions on the subject of partial failure of construction. It is true that a plea of total failure of consideration includes the defense of partial failure of consideration, and that under such a plea the jury may abate the purchase price if the evidence fails to make out the defense of total failure of consideration, but this is subject to the proviso that there must be before the jury sufficient data from which they may with reasonable accuracy assess the amount of the diminution.

[3] 3. In the present case we do not think that the exception to the failure of the judge to instruct the jury as to their right to abate the purchase price on account of partial failure of consideration was hurtful to the plaintiffs, even if it can be said that there was sufficient definite evidence before the jury to allow them to calculate and assess the amount of the abatement of the purchase price, in the event they found a partial failure of consideration. Upon an examination of the charge of the court, we find that he did in an abstract way refer to the fact that total failure of consideration includes partial failure of consideration, and that, in the case of partial failure of consideration only a commensurate abatement of the purchase price will be allowed, still, when he came to the specific application of the law to the case, he informed the jury that the defendants had assumed the burden of proof, and that, unless they made out their plea of total failure of consideration, the verdict should be in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount sued for. So that, if there was any error at all, it was harmful as against the defendants, and not as against the present complainant.

[4] 4. One of the grounds of the plaintiffs' motion for new trial complains that the court allowed the defendants to prove that the purchase price of the horse was represented by a series of three notes, and that one of them had been paid. We think that this evidence was admissible, for if the jury had concluded that there had not been a total failure of consideration, but that there had been a partial failure of consideration to such an extent as the $800 paid represented all that would remain due after allowing proper abatement for the partial failure of consideration, then the verdict should have been for the defendants.

[5] 5. The plaintiffs, for further objection to the evidence, say that the court erred in allowing a witness to state that $50 per month was a reasonable sum for the keeping of the stallion. This was admissible, in connection with testimony as to the number of mares which he was able to impregnate, to show that the services which the stallion was capable of performing were not worth as much as it cost to keep him, thereby showing that the stallion was of little or no market value.

[6] 6. A witness who testified that he had had 18 years experience in the handling of horses, and that he had had the particular stallion in charge during the three months that it lived after it was sold to the defendants, and who had seen it put to the mares and who had kept up with the results, was allowed, after testifying to these things, to state his opinion that the stallion was not a satisfactory and sure breeder. We think that the evidence was admissible, and that the witness had sufficiently qualified as an expert to be allowed to express an opinion upon the question. Even if this is not true, in view of the fact that the witness gave all the facts upon which he based his opinion, the error would not be sufficiently material to justify a reversal.

7. There are certain other errors assigned in the record, but we do not consider any of them to be meritorious. One of them complains of a minor verbal inaccuracy in the court's statement to the jury as to the nature and effect of the express warranty that was made. Taken in connection with the entire charge, however, this inaccuracy could not have been misleading.

[8] The other complaint is that the court failed to instruct the jury as to the undertaking of the defendants to insure the horse and as to the effect of their failure so to do. There is no evidence that the defendants did not insure the horse. The record is silent as to this. If the court had submitted to the jury the issue which the defendants sought to raise by their plea that there should be an abatement of the purchase price because the horse had died, then it would have been his duty to instruct the jury as to the terms of the contract, so far as it related to the death of the horse and to the insuring of it against death. This agreement as to the insuring of the horse was separate and independent of the warranty set forth in the other writing which was submitted to the jury as the basis of the defense. The contract did not require the defendants to insure the horse as an interdependent condition of any agreement, except the agreement that they would replace the horse with another in the event it died. Viewing the whole record carefully, we are of the opinion that the case was tried without material error, and that the verdict of the jury is fully authorized by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RULINGS ON DEMURRER — ASSIGNMENTS OVERRULED.

The errors assigned as to the rulings on demurrer are not well taken.

2. DEPOSITIONS (§ 73*)—REQUISITES OF RETURN—INCLOSING AND SEALING.

It is not good cause for the taking of exception to the return of interrogatories that the answers are not physically attached to the interrogatories, where it appears that the interrogatories, the answers, and the commission were duly sealed together in an envelope and returned to the court, as required in Civil Code 1910, § 5898.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 141*)—DISMISSAL OF ONE CO-PARTY—EFFECT.

Where a petition is jointly filed by two persons, claiming a specified amount of damages on account of a tort, and afterwards the name of one of the parties and all of the allegations relating to the cause of action in his favor are dismissed, but the original statement as to the ad damnum is left in the petition, the court does not err in telling the jury that the remaining plaintiff claims damages in that amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 244*)—OPERATION—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—CARE REQUIRED.

Where a railroad crosses a public road outside of an incorporated town or city, though within less than 400 yards of the corporate limits, the engineer is required to signal the approach of his train to the crossing by blowing the whistle, and the ringing of the bell alone is not sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 755; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

5. NO ERROR.

The case was fairly tried, and no material error appears.

Rosser & Brandon, McLaughlin, Jones & Jones, and Hatton Lovejoy, for plaintiff in error. W. S. Howell and N. F. Culpepper, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The record bristles with points, but many of them are what Justice Samuel Lumpkin in one of his opinions designated as "pintees." The only question which seems to be of such novelty and of such general interest as to require elaboration is the one dealt with in the fourth headnote. The injury complained of in the present case occurred at a crossing which was just outside of the town of Haralson and within about 50 yards of the corporate limits. The court charged the jury the law embodied in Civil Code 1910, § 2675, which requires locomotive engineers to blow the whistle upon approaching public crossings outside of the corporate limits of cities and towns. The train which inflicted the injury was approaching the crossing from the side of it next to the town of Haralson, and there was some evidence that the bell was being rung as the crossing was approached.

[4] The contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error is that the provisions of section 2677 of the Civil Code of 1910 are applicable—that "within the corporate limits of the cities, towns, and villages of this state, the several railroad companies shall not be required to blow the whistle of their locomotives on approaching crossings or public roads in said corporate limits, but in lieu thereof the engineer of said locomotive shall be required to signal the approach of their trains to such crossings and public roads in said corporate limits, by tolling the bell of said locomotive." As to crossings located within the corporate limits of cities, towns, and villages, the whistle should not be blown; the requirement which we have just stated being mandatory, and not permissive only. Georgia Railroad v. Carr, 73 Ga. 357. Much of the reasoning in the case just cited tends to support the theory that the whistle shall not be blown while the train is within the corporate limits of the city, town, or village, even though the crossing about to be approached lies slightly beyond the limits; but the language of the statute itself seems to settle this question. The phrase, "in said corporate limits," which is twice used to designate the public roads mentioned in section 2677, supra, seems to have been advisedly used. The old law required the blowing of whistles as to all crossings; but the amendment contained in the section just referred to relieves from this requirement within the corporate limits of cities, towns, and villages as to trains "approaching crossings or public roads in said corporate limits."

Judgment affirmed.

Viewed in the light of the criteria announced in the case of Florence Wagon Works v. Salmon, 8 Ga. App. 197, 68 S. E. 866, and cases there cited, the amount claimed in the petition as liquidated damages was penalty, and the demurrer to the portion of the petition which sought a recovery therefor should have been sustained.

2. PRICE OF GOODS SOLD.

So far as the petition sought to recover for the purchase price of goods sold and delivered, it was not subject to the demurrer.

H. F. Strohecker, for plaintiff in error. Ryals, Grace & Anderson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. After this case was argued in this court, counsel for the defendant in error, who had recovered a money judgment in the court below, informed the court that his judgment had been satisfied by voluntary payment. Counsel for the plaintiff in error has also stated in a letter written to the clerk that the information is true. After a case has been argued in the court, the parties cannot as a matter of right withdraw the matter from the consideration of the court by any action of theirs; but usually, where the plaintiff in error decides to withdraw, or where the point involved has become a moot question by some matter intervening since the suing out of the writ of error, the court will exercise its discretion by not deciding the case. Cf. McNells v. State, 4 Ga. App. 419, 61 S. E. 842, and cases therein cited. Indeed, the court is usually anxious not to decide moot questions, and, if it discovers, even in an informal way, that the case has been settled, will (unless the parties themselves voluntarily give the information, as was done in this case) issue an order requiring the parties, or their counsel, to inform the court as to whether the case has been settled or not. It appearing that this case is settled, and that nothing but a moot question now remains for decision, it is ordered that the writ of error be dismissed.

Richbourg and Mitchell owed a bank a past-due note. In order to pay that debt the present note, signed by Richbourg, Mitchell, and Tucker, was executed; Tucker signing as surety only. When this note became due, Tucker paid it, and had it transferred to him. At the time this note was made, Richbourg told Tucker that the debt for which he had become liable on the first note was in fact Mitchell's; but, other than Richbourg's unsworn statement as to this fact, there was no proof. Mitchell being out of the state and not subject to service of process, Tucker sued Richbourg, and recovered a judgment for the full amount of the note. Held, that as to the second note Tucker and Richbourg were not cosureties, so as to make the latter liable for contribution only, and that this is true, irrespective of what the relationship may have been between Richbourg and Mitchell as to the note which was paid by the execution of the note sued on.

CARRIERS (§§ 316, 333, 347*) — INJURIES TO PASSENGER — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — QUESTIONS FOR JURY — PRESUMPTIONS.

There being evidence that the plaintiff was a passenger upon a train of the defendant company, having a ticket from Redan, Ga., to Atlanta, Ga.; that there was a well-established custom in respect to this particular train, which was known as the "Shoo-Fly" train, to slow it down or stop it at various street crossings and points in the yards of the defendant company other than the regular station at Atlanta, for the purpose of receiving and discharging passengers; that the train slowed down at a point at which it was accustomed to slow down for the purpose of allowing passengers to alight; and that, when it was running very slowly, the plaintiff, as he had done a number of times before in respect to this same train, attempted to get off, and as he was in the act of alighting, and before he had time to get completely off the steps, the engineer caused the train to give a sudden lurch forward, whereby the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and hurt. Held: (a) It is not negligence, as a matter of law, for a passenger to be upon the platform of a moving train, or for him to attempt to alight from a slowly moving train. Augusta Sou. Railroad v. Snider, 118 Ga. 146, 44 S. E. 1005, distinguishing a number of cases apparently to the contrary, and criticising and practically overruling Paterson v. Railroad Co., 85 Ga. 653, 11 S. E. 872. (b) The fact that the point at which the train slowed down, and at which the plaintiff attempted to alight, was in the midst of a switchyard, where there was likely to be a number of moving trains, does not render the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence adequate to defeat a recovery, since he was not hurt by reason of any of these dangers. (c) Under the facts of the case, the presumption of negligence attached against the carrier. Sanders v. Sou. Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 132 (2), 32 S. E. 840. (d) The court erred in granting a nonsuit.

Acknowledgment of service or waiver of service is a courtesy which the law does not compel, and failure to serve the notice required by the foregoing Code section is not excused because counsel for the defendant in certiorari refused either to waive or to acknowledge service of the notice. The fact that counsel for defendant in error has actual parol notice of the sanction of the certiorari and of the time and place of the hearing makes no difference. *Frank v. 1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 206*)—REVIEW OF DECISION—CERTIORARI—DISMISSAL.

Though a summons issued by a justice of the peace names a number of defendants, only such as are served, or voluntarily appear and plead, become parties to the case. In the case at bar, though the summons designated more than one defendant, it affirmatively appears that only one appeared and pleaded, and there is no evidence that the others were served. The verdict is in terms a finding as between the defendant who appeared and the plaintiff. The court did not err in refusing to dismiss the certiorari brought by the plaintiff, on the ground that the bond was payable only to the defendant in whose favor the verdict was rendered, and not also in favor of the other defendants named in the summons. For a similar reason, failure to serve the other persons with notice of the sanction of the certiorari was not cause for a dismissal of the certiorari.

1. TAXATION (§ 580*)—COLLECTION OF TAXES—TRANSFER OF EXECUTION.

Except in a county having a population of 75,000 or more, the tax collector has no authority to transfer executions for taxes due the state and county. This authority is given to the sheriff or other officer authorized by law to levy tax executions.

Error from City Court of Fitzgerald; M. Wall, Judge.

Rule against the sheriff for the distribution of funds realized from the sale of property under execution. In an action by McIlwaine, Knight & Co. against J. L. King, the Citizens' Bank of Valdosta placed in the hands of the sheriff two executions against the same party. From the judgment of distribution and an order overruling its motion for a new trial, the county of Laurens, intervener, for the use and benefit of Mrs. M. J. Adams, transferee of a tax fi. fa., brings error. Judgment reversed.

The questions in this case arise on a rule against the sheriff for the distribution of funds in his hands, realized from the sale of property under execution.

The undisputed facts are as follows: On April 6, 1909, the sheriff sold the property in question for $1,100, in pursuance of an execution in favor of McIlwaine, Knight & Co. against J. L. King, issued from the city court of Ashburn on January 21, 1908. On the day of the sale, the Citizens' Bank of Valdosta, as transferee, placed in his hands two fi. fas. against the defendant J. L. King, one in favor of T. L. Griner, and the other in favor of the Southern Hat Company, based on judgments of the city court of Ashburn rendered December 16, 1907. The transfers of these two executions to the bank were duly entered on the general execution docket on January 21, 1908. Ewell Brown intervened as transferee of a fi. fa. based upon a judgment issued from the city court of Ashburn, rendered on October 31, 1907, in favor of the Swift Fertilizer Works against King, for the principal sum of $354.64, interest, attorney's fees, and costs. This execution was duly entered on the general execution docket, and had on it a duly recorded transfer, purporting to have been made by J. H. Pate, attorney for plaintiff in fi. fa., dated May 5, 1909, to Ewell Brown, reciting that the transfer was for value received. A credit of cash $125, dated November 11, 1907, was entered on it, and there was also upon it an entry of levy on the identical property from which the fund to be distributed by the court was realized, dated November 4, 1908. J. B. Wall testified that in the fall of 1908 he paid to the sheriff by a draft drawn on J. L. King, the defendant, through the Lake Park Bank, the full amount due on this execution, that the execution was attached to the draft, and that he represented the defendant in making the payment, and the sheriff testified that this witness had paid him the amount due on the execution. The evidence is silent as to how the execution got into the possession of J. H. Pate, the attorney who made the transfer to Ewell Brown, or how it got into the possession of Ewell Brown except by the transfer as above stated. The county of Laurens intervened for the use and benefit of Mrs. M. J. Adams, transferee of a tax execution issued by the tax collector of Laurens county in January, 1907, against J. L. King, for state and county taxes of the year 1906 for $208.34, besides interest and $1.50 costs. Upon the back of this tax fi. fa. was an entry that the same was transferred by C. H. Adams, tax collector of the said county, on October 18, 1907, to Mrs. M. J. Adams, for and in consideration of the sum of $208.34, the principal of the fi. fa. This fi. fa. was entered on the general execution docket of Laurens county on October 18, 1907. The sheriff testified, and it was not controverted, that he sold the property under the fi. fa. in favor of McIlwaine, Knight & Co. for the sum of $1,100; that, before any other executions were placed in his hands claiming any part of the fund realized from the sale of this property, the plaintiffs in that execution demanded payment of their execution, and that he paid it in full and had remaining in his hands for distribution the sum of $610.86.

It was agreed that the judge, without the intervention of a jury, should decide the questions of law and fact, and distribute the fund remaining in the hands of the sheriff. The judge distributed the fund as follows: (1) The payment made by the sheriff of the fi. fa. in favor of McIlwaine, Knight & Co. was approved. (2) The costs due the sheriff, the costs for the attorney who filed an answer for the sheriff to the rule, and the costs due the clerk of the city court were ordered to be paid. It was ordered that the sum of $564.36 remaining in the hands of the sheriff be applied as follows: (3) Upon the fi. fa. in favor of T. L. Griner transferred to the Citizens' Bank of Valdosta, $284.40. (4) Upon the fi. fa. in favor of Southern Hat Company, transferred to the Citizens' Bank of Valdosta, $86.83. (5) Upon the fi. fa. in favor of Swift Fertilizer Works, transferred to Ewell Brown, $194.13. The court held that the tax execution had no lien upon the fund in the sheriff's hands. The county of Laurens, intervener, for the use and benefit of Mrs. M. J. Adams, transferee of the tax fi. fa., filed a motion for a new trial on the general grounds, and it excepts to the judgment overruling its motion.

Jos. B. Wall, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Dodson and Jno. B. Hutcheson, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is admitted by plaintiff in error that the tax collector of Laurens county had no authority under the law to transfer the tax fi. fa. in favor of the state and county to Mrs. M. J. Adams, transferee, and that his attempt to transfer it was void and of no legal effect, as he was not at that time the collecting officer of the county; and, the state and county taxes for that year having gone into the form of an execution, it became the duty of the sheriff to collect the taxes, and it was the sheriff's duty to transfer the fi. fa. upon payment of the amount by Mrs. Adams. Pol. Code 1895, § 888.

It is insisted, however, that the payment by Mrs. Adams to the tax collector was not a settlement of the taxes due the state and county by the defendant in fi. fa. This did not relieve the sheriff of the duty of collecting the taxes due on that fi. fa., and, as the attempted transfer of the execution by the tax collector was void, the lien of the fi. fa. still remains in the county. See Hill v. Georgia State Building & Loan Association, 120 Ga. 472, 47 S. E. 897, in which case the Supreme Court holds that the execution issued by the tax collector for state and county taxes could not be lawfully transferred by the tax collector of the county, for the total population of the county was less than 75,000 inhabitants. It was conceded that the county of Laurens had a population of less than 75,000 inhabitants.

[2] It is insisted in the second place that the lien of the state and county under this fi. fa. was not divested by the payment of $208.34 principal thereon, because there was shown to be still due on the fi. fa. interest and costs. See Wilson v. Herrington, 86 Ga. 777, 13 S. E. 129, in which it was held that, notwithstanding the transfer of the tax execution, the sheriff was entitled to proceed to enforce collection for the reason that there remained due upon it $1 for costs, and, as long as there was anything still due on the execution, any attempted transfer of the same, even by the sheriff, was not legally effective to divest the lien of the fi. fa. in favor of the state and county for the taxes.

[3] We think the contention of learned counsel on both of these points is sound, and that for both of the reasons given in the decisions cited, the title to this execution remained in the county of Laurens, and it had a prior lien on the property of the defendant for the amount still due on the fi. fa., to wit, interest, and costs, and was entitled to be paid this amount before the payment of the other executions against the defendant. Powell on Actions for Land, § 238.

The statute (Civil Code 1910, §§ 3712, 3713, 3714) fixing a penalty for a prescribed act, and giving to the injured party a remedy by civil action, with a proviso that if the action fails the defendant shall have judgment against the plaintiff for all costs and reasonable attorney's fees, does not violate the constitutional guaranty of complete and impartial protection under the law, on the ground that the plaintiff is not given any right to recover attorney's fees.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 344*)—INTERFERENCE WITH RELATION—STATUTORY PROVISION.

The Code sections (Civil Code 1910, §§ 3712, 3713, 3714) denounce as unlawful an interference with the contractual relation of employer and employé, of landlord and tenant, and of landlord and cropper, by employment or renting or furnishing land to the tenant or employé, except on certain conditions, and give to the injured party a remedy by civil action for a penalty. Section 3715 declares that "the provisions of the three preceding sections shall not apply where the employment given is of such duration and of such nature as to make it certain that it could not result in injury to the plaintiff or prosecutor." The employment referred to in the foregoing saving clause is that of such a transient character as it is not inconsistent with the service which the employé contracted to give his employer. The evidence did not authorize a charge on section 3715.

CLARK, C. J. This cause was decided at last term (Carson v. Bunting, 154 N. C. 530, 70 S. The judge below, upon the certificate of the opinion of this court, rendered judgment accordingly. The defendant excepted to the judgment and appealed.

This presents for our consideration only the form of the judgment rendered, which is in strict conformity with our opinion. The appeal is in fact, and the argument of the defendant is so based, upon the ground that the former judgment of this court was erroneous. No other question is presented. In Roberts v. Baldwin, 155 N. C. 276, 71 S. E. 319, Allen, J., citing many cases, said: "It has been repeatedly decided that a judgment of this court cannot be reviewed by a second appeal." We need not discuss a decision which has been so repeatedly made.

2. SALES (§ 384*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

For breach of defendant's contract to take the output of plaintiff's shingle mill, plaintiff was entitled to no more than the difference between the contract price and the price at which he sold the shingles manufactured before he closed down; there being no evidence that he thereafter had or could get material for more, or that he afterwards kept the mill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1098-1107; Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by S. E. Pool against J. L. Walker, administrator. From the judgment, giving less than claimed, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

It appeared that in 1906 plaintiff borrowed of J. D. Overton, the intestate, a sum of money, and to secure payment of the loan executed a mortgage on real property, with power of sale, etc.; that Overton died in 1908, and defendant, administrator, having made several efforts to obtain payment, proceeded to advertise the property for sale under the mortgage, the sale to take place the 17th of January, 1910. Thereupon plaintiff instituted the present action, and obtained an injunction staying the sale on affidavits alleging that J. D. Overton in 1906 had contracted and agreed to take the output of plaintiff's shingle mill, which he was then erecting, at a specified price per thousand, that said Overton had wrongfully failed and refused to comply with said contract, and the damages caused by said breach of contract was more than sufficient to pay off and discharge the loan. Pleadings having been duly filed, issues were submitted and responded to by the jury, in effect that the amount due on the note was $2,998, and that the amount due plaintiff from intestate by reason of breach of contract in reference to shingle mill was $350, with interest from September 14, 1908. Judgment was thereupon given, crediting defendant's claim with the $350 and interest. Judgment of foreclosure entered for the balance of the debt. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

M. Majette and E. F. Aydlott, for appellant. W. M. Bond, T. H. Woodley, and Meekins & Tillitt, for appellee.

HOKE, J. There is no error. It appeared in evidence that plaintiff's shingle mill was completed and began operations on or about the 18th or 19th of June, 1908, and closed down on the 2d of September of the same year, having manufactured 175,000 shingles, which plaintiff sold at a loss of $2 per 1,000 on the alleged contract price. This loss was allowed plaintiff by the verdict, and has been credited on defendant's claim.

[1] There was no stated time alleged in the pleadings or shown forth in evidence during which the intestate was to take the output of plaintiff's mill, and it is well understood that on these continuous contracts, where no time is fixed "during which it is to last, and none is fixed by law or usage, it may be determined at the will of either party upon notice." Clark on Contracts, p. 430.

[2] And on the testimony no good reason appears for a greater recovery than the loss sustained on the shingles which were in fact manufactured. In this connection the case on appeal further states: "There was no evidence that any of the shingles made were ever tendered or offered to Overton, or to defendant, or that plaintiff, when he stopped the mill, had or could get timber to make any more shingles, or that he kept the mill, or whether it was used thereafter, or remained idle, nor any evidence as to the amount of capital invested in it, or that plaintiff offered to make any more shingles."

On this record there is no error, certainly, which gives plaintiff any just ground for complaint, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Greene County; Ferguson, Judge.

On application of Roberta C. Dixon to remove a guardian. From a judgment denying the application, the ward appeals. Reversed.

George M. Lindsay, for appellant. Aycock & Winston and T. C. Wooten, for appellee J. W. Dixon.

CLARK, C. J. The clerk of the superior court, after citation to J. W. Dixon, guardian of Roberta Dixon, and upon his answer filed, removed him from his guardianship upon the ground that he had failed to file his account as guardian, and, further, because said guardian claimed an interest in the property adverse to his ward. On appeal of the judge, this order was reversed, and the ward, Roberta C. Dixon, appealed to this court, prosecuting said appeal through her guardian ad litem, appointed by the court by consent.

It is found by the judge upon facts admitted that Robert A. L. Carr executed a deed to his daughter, the mother of the ward, Roberta Dixon; that in said deed, after the warranty clause, said grantor added, "I, the said R. A. L. Carr, reserving a life interest for myself and wife, Sarah A. L. Carr, in the above described land." The grantee, the mother of said ward, and the daughter of the grantor, died first of all, then the grantor, and lastly his wife died. It being admitted that there was birth of issue of the marriage of the grantee in said deed, J. W. Dixon, the guardian, contended that he was entitled to the rents and profits of said land as tenant by the curtesy, and was not accountable to said ward for said rents.

[1, 2] The reservation in the deed is valid, and said deed did not become effective till after the death of the grantor and his wife. It is true that the exception in favor of the grantor's wife could not operate as a conveyance to her, but the question as to the title to rents and profits after death of the grantor and until the death of his widow is a question to be settled between their personal representatives, and in no wise concerns the guardian, J. W. Dixon.

[3, 4] The sole question as to him is whether he became tenant by the curtesy of this land. His wife having predeceased the grantor, his wife was never seised of the premises, and, upon the expiration of the particular estate by the death of Mrs. Carr, the title passed directly to Roberta Dixon, as heir at law of her mother. J. W. Dixon's claim to be tenant by the curtesy is therefore unfounded. His refusal to account for the rents and profits and his claim to the rent, adverse to his ward, was sufficient ground to justify his removal. Revisal, § 1806.

In Nixon v. Williams, 95 N. C. 103, it was held that, to entitle a husband to curtesy in his wife's land, either the wife or the husband, in right of his wife, must have had seisin in deed, which is the actual possession of the land. In this case it is admitted that neither Dixon nor his wife had any possession of said land during the life of the grantor and his wife. In Gentry v. Wagstaff, 14 N. C. 270, it was held that the husband acquires by marriage no estate in any land of his wife of which neither he nor his wife had possession, and that where the wife's interest in real estate is in reversion or remainder, dependent on a preceding freehold estate in another, she has no seisin until the determination of that estate. In Sasser v. Blyth, 2 N. C. 259, it was held, upon facts exactly similar to those in this case, that where a man executed a deed to his son in fee simple, reserving a life estate, that such reservation is valid. The learned reporter (Judge John Haywood) appends a note that this is not a case of repugnancy, because it is "by no means inconsistent with the estate in fee in remainder that another should first have the estate for life." The rule that the first words in a deed and the last in a will control in cases of repugnant provisions do not apply. Construing the whole deed as written, there is here a reservation of the estate for the life of the grantor and his wife, with remainder in fee to their daughter. Blackwell v. Blackwell, 124 N. C. 269, 32 S. E. 676; Wall v. Wall, 126 N. C. 405, 35 S. E. 811. This is not like Wilkins v. Norman, 139 N. C. 41, 51 S. E. 790, 111 Am. St. Rep. 767, where an estate in fee simple was conveyed, and there was a subsequent clause which conveyed the land to another after the death of the grantee in fee. The last clause was held repugnant and void.

[5] In Featherstone v. Merrimon, 148 N. C. 199, 61 S. E. 675, Walker, J., says: "In construing a deed, the court will examine the entire instrument and construe it as a whole consistent with reason and common sense, to effectuate the intention of the parties." There can be no question here as to the intention of the grantor, which is very clearly expressed. To the same effect is Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 396, 63 S. E. 80 (24 L. R. A. [N. S.] 514), in which Brown, J., says that the courts will look at the whole instrument to ascertain its intention, and will "not regard as very material in what part of the deed such intention is manifested."

The judgment of his honor is reversed.

The defendant was indicted for larceny of some tin, and a count in the bill for receiving the tin, knowing it to have been stolen. There was a verdict of guilty of receiving the tin, knowing it to have been stolen, and judgment imprisoning defendant for four months, to be worked on the roads of Pitt county.

Julius Brown, for appellant. T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., and G. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROWN, J. The only question presented for our consideration is the sufficiency of the evidence submitted to the jury.

[1] The evidence tends to prove that the prosecutor, Jenkins, had been missing tin from his shop; that in searching for the tin he found it on defendant's house. Prosecutor identified the tin by certain marks, and there was corroborative evidence in support of such identification. The evidence also shows that defendant told the prosecutor and another witness that he got the tin from Sears, Roebuck & Co. The prosecutor proposed to go with defendant to the railroad office and examine the books, but the defendant declined to go, and then said that he got the tin from a man near the railroad, and he would rather pay for it than to tell the man's name or have any trouble about it, and he did pay the prosecutor $15 for the tin. On the trial the defendant testified that he got the tin not from Sears, Roebuck & Co., nor from a man who lived near the depot, but from one Edmundson, and Edmundson said that he got it from a dead man.

The court charged the jury that the fact that the tin was found in the defendant's possession did not create a presumption of guilt under the circumstances of this case, but that it was a circumstance, which, taken with all the other evidence must satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt.

[2] We see no error in this of which the defendant can justly complain. If erroneous, it was in defendant's favor. The finding of the tin in defendant's possession, together with the different and conflicting statements made by defendant in attempting to account for its possession, warranted the judge in submitting the question of defendant's guilt to the jury.

No error.

1. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 20*)—OBSTRUCTION—BRIDGES.

One whose boat is wrecked while sailing to get in position to pass through a draw of a railroad bridge over navigable waters has no cause of action on the ground of illegal obstruction of the waters by erection of the bridge, constructed under authority of the state and the supervisory powers of the federal government.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Justice, Judge.

Action by C. W. Whitehurst against the Norfolk & Southern Railroad and the McLean Construction Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed and dismissed.

These issues were submitted:

"First. Was plaintiff's boat and cargo damaged by the negligence of defendant railway company as alleged? Answer: Yes.

"Second. What damage, if any, has plaintiff sustained? Answer: Boat and cargo $1,500."

In apt time defendants moved to nonsuit, which motion was denied, and defendants excepted. From the judgment rendered, the defendants appealed.

W. M. Bond, for appellants. E. F. Aylett and J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for appellees.

BROWN, J. On December 22, 1909, the defendant company by its contractors, the construction company, was constructing a railway bridge about six miles long from Mackey's Ferry, across Albemarle Sound, to its northern shore near Edenton. The bridge was not entirely completed, nor in use by the railroad company. In the northern part of this bridge is located a large drawbridge, over deep water intended for passage of vessels. This was about completed, but could not be opened on day named because the cement had not had time to set. There is also another pivot drawbridge in southern portion of the bridge about 1½ miles from the southern shore. This drawbridge is over 70 feet long. It turns upon a central pillar, and leaves 35 feet clear space open on each side of the pillar for passage of vessels. On date named the pivot draw was opened—that is, extended east and west—the main bridge running north and south. The 35-foot space on northern side of the pivotal pillar was obstructed by a pile driver at work on the bridge abutment. The other side of the draw was clear and open for passage of vessels. There was nothing to prevent a vessel passing through it, wind and weather permitting.

The evidence of the plaintiff shows that on date named he was beating (tacking) his schooner Alva up Albemarle Sound bound for Avoca, loaded with 2,000 bushels of oyster shell. The wind was blowing from west northwest, being almost dead ahead for Avoca, which is some miles west of the bridge. The plaintiff was tacking back and forth, making for the large northern draw, at 9 a. m., when he was told by the skipper of the Waterboy that the northern draw was closed. Plaintiff at once steered south for the southern draw. When he was opposite it, he saw that the northern side was blocked by pile driver at work. He attempted to tack and stand away from the bridge so as to lay his course and go through the open space on southern side of the long draw bridge. When he put his helm down to tack, the Alva "missed stays"—that is, failed to "go about," and put her bow into the wind. Instead, she fell off before the wind, and her sails, filling in a strong breeze, caused her to be wrecked on a shoal. The Alva was 25 years old, and the plaintiff, her owner and captain, 62, with 40 years' experience on the waters of Albemarle Sound.

[1] It is admitted the bridge in question was constructed under the authority of the General Assembly of this state and under the supervisory powers conferred on the government of the United States in such cases by act of Congress. The right of the state, subject to the power of the national government to authorize such structures across navigable bodies of water within its borders, is too well settled to be now discussed. Pedrick v. N. & S. R. R., 143 N. C. 486, 55 S. E. 877, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 554, and cases cited; Works v. Railroad, Fed. Cas. No. 18,046. It is settled beyond controversy that where a bridge over a navigable stream is erected by authority of law for public purposes and benefit, and leaves reasonable spaces for the passage of vessels, it is not a nuisance, but a lawful structure. Pedrick v. Railroad, supra. For the convenience and safety of navigation, it is well known that the plans and specifications of such structures as this and its drawbridges must be approved by the proper federal officials. It is manifest that plaintiff has no cause of action arising out of an illegal obstruction of Albemarle Sound by the erection of this bridge across it.

[2] Nor are we able to perceive that the defendant was guilty of negligence and wanting in the discharge of any duty it owed the plaintiff, while constructing this bridge. Its "draws" had not been completed, and could not be used with the facility for passing vessels that they now afford. It is manifest that in constructing these draws navigation must necessarily be much more inconvenienced and impeded than when they are in a completed state and properly operated. Such temporary inconvenience must be suffered for the public weal.

[3] It is manifest from plaintiff's evidence that the proximate cause of his loss was an accident which neither he nor any one else could foresee or prevent. The plaintiff was beating to windward against a strong north-northwesterly wind heading for the northern draw. Before he reached it, he was informed from the Waterboy that it was closed. The plaintiff doubtless "eased off his sheets," and pointed towards the southern draw. It was no trouble for him to "stand away" from the bridge as far off as he pleased, for the bridge was to his windward, and the wind was blowing him away from it. Plaintiff says he was given no notice or signal that the northern side of the southern draw was blocked by a pile driver. It was 9 o'clock in the morning, and any reasonable vigilance could have discovered such a lofty object as a pile driver 100 yards away. Plaintiff, however, says he did see the obstruction when he got opposite the draw. At that time he was in open water and in no danger in case his vessel worked all right. He then "tacked ship" with the evident intention of getting in a position, and then laying his course through the open draw, but unfortunately the Alva falled him at the critical moment. Instead of "coming about" in obedience to her helm, she fell off, and, before he could recover her, she grounded on the shoal, which according to the uncontradicted evidence was 250 yards from the bridge, and 2,000 feet from the southern draw. The failure to answer her helm and tack at the critical moment has wrecked sailing craft before the Alva. Her misbehavior was plainly the proximate cause of her grounding on the shoal.

It is a superstition among sailors that sailing craft have their individual peculiarities and idiosyncrasies, and become unmanageable when least expected. Some one, doubtless a crusty and disappointed bachelor, has said that is the reason they are given the feminine gender and called "she." This plaintiff, an experienced sailor, knew his craft, and that she was heavily laden, and not so active as when light. It may have been the part of wisdom to have dropped anchor and waited for a more favorable breeze rather than attempt to beat through a drawbridge against a strong head wind. However that may be, we see nothing in the record which justly renders the defendants liable for the loss of plaintiff's vessel.

The motion to nonsuit is sustained, and the action dismissed.

Reversed.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 397*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Parol evidence will not be received to contradict or alter the terms of a contract in writing, and all oral parts of the contract and contemporary declarations are incompetent for such purpose.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 444*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—EXISTENCE OF CONDITIONS.

Although a written instrument purporting to be a definite contract is signed and delivered, it may be shown by parol evidence that such delivery was conditional.

3. SALES (§ 53*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—QUESTION FOR JURY—ABSOLUTE OR CONDITIONAL CONTRACT.

In an action for the price of a gasoline tank, held, that whether the written order was delivered to plaintiff on condition that it was not to become a binding agreement until plaintiff obtained permission from the town to bury the tank in the street, or was delivered with the intent that it should be presently binding as a contract of sale, was a question for the jury.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 420*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS.

Where a written order for goods, delivered with the intent that it shall be presently binding as a contract of sale, contains a stipulation that the order shall not be countermanded, the buyer cannot show in an action for the price that he had reserved the right to countermand the order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; J. S. Adams, Judge.

Action by S. F. Bowser & Co., Inc., against one Tarry. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Plaintiff sued on an instrument alleged to be a written contract bearing date December 16, 1909, for the purchase of a gasoline tank, with incidental appliances, at the price of $140. The tank was shipped from Ft. Wayne, Ind., on December 15, 1909, and arrived at Littleton, N. C., some time in the latter part of the month, and was taken out of the railroad depot by defendant, as he stated, for purpose of saving storage. Defendant having denied liability, on issue submitted, the court charged the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price $140. Verdict for same in plaintiff's favor. Judgment, and defendant excepted and appealed, assigning errors chiefly as to the rulings of the court on questions of evidence.

J. M. Picot and Jos. P. Pippen, for appellant. Geo. Green and Murray Allen, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The written instrument purporting to bear date December 16, 1909, expressed a definite order for the tank and appliances at the stated price of $140, and contained further stipulation as follows: "It is agreed by purchaser that this order shall not be countermanded; and, when filled and due as per specifications and terms herein stated, that there shall be no defense for nonpayment. It is further agreed that, in default of payment, S. F. Bowser & Co., Incorporated, or their agent, may take possession of and remove said goods without legal process, unless such default be granted by special letter from S. F. Bowser & Co., Incorporated." This paper witness was received in evidence without objection. Plaintiff put defendant on the stand, who testified on his examination in chief that he signed the instrument, and that he had not paid the price or any part of same. On cross-examination the witness was allowed to state: "The agent for the Bowser Company came in to see me some time in December, 1909, and explained to me the uses and need for his gasoline tank. I told him that I thought it was a fine thing, and would certainly like to have one, and that I would buy one if I could get permission from the town authorities to bury the tank under the street. The agent replied that there was no possible danger from the use of the tank, and that he could not see how the town authorities could object. I told him that I would buy the tank with the understanding that, if I could not get permission from the town authorities, I could not and would not accept the tank. The agent replied that his factory was greatly overrun with orders, and that it would be impossible to ship the tank before February 1, 1910, and that in the meantime I would have ample time and opportunity to see the town authorities and arrange to place the tank, and that, if I could not do so, then I could countermand the order, and need not take the tank. All of this conversation and every word of it was prior to my signing the contract, though after signing the same we had general talk, but as to what was stated by either of us in the general talk, after signing the contract, I cannot and do not swear to. The agent left. Before the 1st day of January, 1910, the tank, which he had told me would not be shipped, or could not be shipped until the 1st of February, 1910, arrived. I had not then seen the town authorities, not having had the opportunity to, and not expecting the tank before the time promised by the agent. I took the tank out of the warehouse to save storage charges, and, pending permission to plant the same by the town authorities, I immediately went to the street commissioner of the town of Littleton, who is the proper authority to give permission in such cases, and he positively refused to permit me to bury the tank in the street. I then asked my landlord if I might bury the tank under his building, and he refused me permission to do so. (I then wrote the Bowser Company that they had shipped the tank before the time agreed by their agent, and that I could not, after having tried, get permission from the town authorities nor from my landlord to place the tank where I could use it, and it was therefore valueless to me.) I went at once and shipped the tank back to the Bowser Company, prepaying freight, and have never been notified by the railroad that the shipment was refused." On objection by plaintiff this statement was excluded, and in this ruling we think there was error.

[1] The general principle insisted and relied upon by plaintiff is undoubted that oral evidence will not be received to contradict or vary a written contract. In Ray v. Blacknall, 94 N. C. 16, Chief Justice Smith, speaking to the question, said: "It is a settled rule, too firmly established in the law of evidence to need a reference to authority in its support, that parol evidence will not be heard to contradict or alter the terms of a contract put in writing, and all contemporary declarations and understandings are incompetent for such purpose." And, again, in the same opinion, "the cases which are apparently to the contrary do not contravene this rule," but rest upon the idea that the writing does not contain the contract, but is in part execution of it. Numerous decisions in the state before and since are in affirmance and application of the principle. Walker v. Venters, 148 N. C. 388, 62 S. E. 510; Medicine Co. v. Mizell, 148 N. C. 384, 62 S. E. 511; Basnight v. Jobbing Co., 148 N. C. 350, 62 S. E. 420; Bank v. Moore, 138 N. C. 529, 51 S. E. 79. Even when a contemporaneous oral stipulation would be otherwise received because it too was a part of the contract, this will not be allowed when it contradicts the portion of the agreement which is reduced to writing. This is well stated by the present Chief Justice in Walker v. Venters as follows: "It is true that a contract may be partly in writing and partly oral (except when forbidden by the statute of frauds), and in such case the oral part of the agreement may be shown, but this is subject to the well-established rule that a contemporaneous agreement shall not contradict that which is written. The written word abides."

[2] While this position is unquestioned, it is also fully understood that, although a written instrument purporting to be a definite contract has been signed and delivered, it may be shown by parol evidence that such delivery was on condition that the same was not to be operative as a contract until the happening of some contingent event, and this on the idea, not that a written contract could be contradicted or varied by parol, but that, until the specified event occurred, the instrument did not become a binding agreement between the parties. It never, in fact, became their contract. The principle has been applied with us in several well-considered decisions, as in Pratt v. Chaffin, 136 N. C. 350, 48 S. E. 768, Kelly v. Oliver, 113 N. C. 442, 18 S. E. 698, and Penniman v. Alexander, 111 N. C. 427, 16 S. E. 408, and is now very generally recognized (Ware v. Allen, 128 U. S. 590, 9 Sup. Ct. 174, 32 L. Ed. 563; Wilson v. Powers, 131 Mass. 539; Rym v. Cambill et al., 88 E. C. L. 370; Clark on Contracts, p. 391; Lawson on Contracts, § 376; Anson on Contracts [Amer. Ed.] p. 318); and, except in deeds conveying real estate, obtains though the instrument is under seal and delivery has been to the other party (Blewitt v. Boorum et al., 142 N. Y. 357, 37 N. E. 119, 40 Am. St. Rep. 600). In Ware v. Allen, supra, the rule is expressed thus: "Parol evidence is admissible in an action between the parties to show that a written instrument executed and delivered by the party obligor to the party obligee absolute on its face was conditional, and not intended to take effect until another event should take place." And in Anson on Contracts, supra, it is said: "In like manner the parties to a written contract may agree that, until the happening of a condition which is not put in writing, the contract is to remain inoperative." Applying the principle, we are of opinion that the proposed evidence should have been received.

[3] The statement by permissible interpretation presents the view that the instrument, though in writing and in the form of a definite contract, was delivered to plaintiff's agent on condition that same was not to become a binding agreement and operative unless and until the town authorities gave their permission to bury the tank in the street. There is also the permissible view, with evidence tending to support it, that the instrument was delivered with the intent that same should presently bind as a contract of sale, and, on the facts as they now appear, the issue should be determined by the jury on the question whether the instrument was delivered on the condition stated or with the intent that the parties should be presently bound.

[4] And in this last event it would not be open to defendant to show by parol that he had reserved the right to countermand the order. That would be to annex a condition subsequent and in direct contradiction of the express stipulation of the written instrument.

There is error, and defendant is entitled to have the cause tried before another jury.
New trial.

TAYLOE v. CARROW et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 13, 1911.)

1. PARTITION (§ 77*)—ACTUAL PARTITION OR SALE.

The advisability of an actual partition or sale is a question of fact for the decision of the clerk in the first instance, subject to review by the judge of the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 211-223; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 113*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF TRIAL JUDGE.

The action of a judge of the superior court in setting aside the report of partition commissioners, advising actual partition, and ordering a sale, is not reviewable, unless an error of law was committed.

3. PARTITION (§ 77*)—PROCEEDINGS—FINALITY OF DECREE—ACTUAL PARTITION.

A decree of a judge of the superior court, ordering an actual partition of a part and a sale of the remainder of land, under Revisal 1905, § 2516, is interlocutory until decree of confirmation is made, though the purchase money has been paid and possession taken by the purchaser, so that the judge could, after having decreed an actual allotment to one of the heirs and sale of the remainder, upon the coming in of a second report, decree that the entire property be sold, upon a finding that actual allotment of a part is impracticable; his former decree, making actual allotment of part, not being res judicata.

4. PARTITION (§ 77*)—ACTUAL PARTITION—RIGHT.

Tenants in common are entitled to an actual partition, if it can be made without injury to any of the co-owners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 211-223; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

5. PARTITION (§ 110*)—DECREE—SALE—CONFIRMATION.

Title to land sold in partition will not be executed until the purchase money has been paid, even though there has been a decree of confirmation of the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 398-400; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

6. PARTITION (§ 113*)—PROCEEDINGS—FINALITY OF DECREE—ACTUAL PARTITION.

That separate appeals from the determination of the clerk as to partition or sale go up to different judges of the superior court does not prevent a judge hearing a second or subsequent appeal from a decree of sale of the whole tract, though another judge has on a former appeal ordered an actual allotment of a part; such order being interlocutory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Ward, Judge.

Action by Joseph F. Tayloe against Annie H. Carrow and others for the partition of land. From a decree of partition by sale, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nicholson & Daniel, for appellant. W. C. Rodman and Small, MacLean & McMullan, for appellee Tayloe. Martin & Critcher, for appellee Godwin.

CLARK, C. J. [1] This is a petition for sale of land for partition; the plaintiff alleging that the land was not susceptible of actual partition. Some of the defendants answered, asking that the land be actually divided. The clerk made an order directing actual partition and appointing commissioners. To this order the petitioner and certain of the defendants excepted. The commissioners attempted to make actual partition, and filed a report; but two of them reported further that, owing to the shape, area, and topography of the land, the best interest of all the parties would be subserved by a sale. This the clerk overruled, and confirmed the report. Upon appeal to the judge the partition was set aside, and the commissioners were directed to set apart and allot one-seventh in value of the land to the defendant Annie Carrow (who alone insisted on actual partition), and ordered a sale of the remainder for partition. The second set of commissioners made their report, which was confirmed by the clerk; but on appeal the judge set aside the report of the commissioners and directed that the entire property be sold for partition, finding as a fact that this property could not be fairly divided and that a sale would best subserve the interests of all parties. In Ledbetter v. Pinner, 120 N. C. 455, 27 S. E. 123, the court said: "The only controverted fact arising on the pleadings was as to the advisability of a sale for partition or an actual partition. This was not an issue of fact, but a question of fact for the decision of the clerk in the first instance, subject to review by the judge on appeal."

[2] This action of the judge in setting aside the report and ordering a sale is not reviewable, unless there is an error of law committed. In Simmons v. Foscoe, 81 N. C. 86, the court said: "Of the force and effect of the evidence in inducing the exercise of that reasonable discretion reposed by law in the judge when called on to confirm the action of the commissioners, he alone must determine, and if no error in law was committed we cannot reverse his decision." This has been cited and approved. Trull v. Rice, 92 N. C. 572; McMillan v. McMillan, 123 N. C. 577, 31 S. E. 729.

[3] The appellant, Annie Carrow, insists that error in law was committed, in that the judge, having decreed actual allotment to her of one-seventh and a sale of the remainder, the matter was res judicata, and he could not, upon setting aside the report, decree a sale of the part allotted to her. Revisal 1905, § 2516, authorizes the judge to decree actual partition of a part of the land and a sale of the remainder; but his decree to that effect is interlocutory, as much so as the decree for the sale of the remainder. Until the confirmation of the report, the whole matter rests in the judgment of the clerk, subject to review by the judge, whose action is binding on us, unless an error of law has been committed. A judge might well find, on the coming in of a report, that the clerk's former order directing actual partition was impracticable, as the judge found here upon the report of two of the commissioners, and direct, as his honor has done, that the report be set aside and actual partition of part and a sale for partition of the rest. For the same reason he might find, as he has done on the second report coming in, that the evidence showed that the actual allotment of a part of the land to one tenant in common was impracticable, or that it damaged the sale of the remainder of the tract. He has so found as a fact in the case, and thereupon it was eminently proper that he should set aside the report, and with it the former order directing the allotment to Annie Carrow, and decree a sale of the whole tract at an upset price, both in parcels and as a whole (as he has done here), and on coming in of the report of this sale it will be competent for the judge, upon appeal from the clerk, to confirm said sale, or set aside the report and direct actual or partial partition, or a resale as he may then find to be to the interest of the parties. Such orders, being interlocutory, rest in the discretion of the court.

[4] Prima facie, tenants in common are entitled to actual partition, but only when such partition can be made without injury to any of the parties. Revisal 1905, § 2512; Gillespie v. Allison, 115 N. C. 548, 20 S. E. 627. In Skinner v. Carter, 108 N. C. 109, 12 S. E. 908, it is said that, the judge "having the power to set aside the report, he might also make any order that could formerly have been made either by the clerk or the judge under such circumstances." The judge in the beginning was vested with the power to decree actual partition, or a partial partition, or a sale for partition. Having set aside the report, as he had power to do, the matter was then open to him, as res nova. Being better advised by the report or further evidence, he could not only refer it to new commissioners, but he could direct actual partition of the whole tract, or a sale of the whole, or a partition of part and a sale of the remainder, just as he could originally. No title vested until the decree of confirmation upon the final report of the commissioners. Until the decree of confirmation the proceedings are not final, but interlocutory, and rest in the discretion of the court, even though the purchase money has been paid and the purchaser has taken possession of the premises. Knapp on Partition, 335.

[5] On the other hand, even when there has been a decree of confirmation, title will not be executed until the purchase money has been paid. Burgin v. Burgin, 82 N. C. 197; White, Ex parte, 82 N. C. 378.

[6] It makes no difference that the appeals may go up to different judges. The appeals are all from the clerk to the judge of the superior court. The former judgments of the judge, being interlocutory, are subject to be set aside or modified by him or his successors.

The minutiae of the controverted details as to the successive appeals from the clerk to the judge need not be discussed by us. The judge below correctly held that they were immaterial irregularities at the most. Affirmed.

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 37*)—MESSAGES—CARE REQUIRED.

Telegraph companies need only exercise that degree of care in delivering messages which one of ordinary prudence would use under like circumstances.

5. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 40*)—MESSAGES—CONTRACT—DELIVERY.

Since a telegraph company cannot disclose the contents of a message to other than the sendee without the permission of the sender or sendee, the company under its usual contract need not telephone the message, nor has it the right to do so to one not the agent of the sendee, unless authorized to receive it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Martin County; Ward, Judge.

Action by F. M. Barnes against the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Stubbs and S. A. Newell, for appellant. R. C. Strong, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for mental anguish, alleged to have been caused by the negligent delay of the defendant in transmitting and delivering a telegram. The message, dated November 26, 1909, was addressed by Mrs. Frank Barnes to Francis W. Barnes at Williamston, N. C., and read as follows: "Come at once. Your father very sick." It was transmitted from the initial point to Greenville with due promptness, and reached the office in that place at 8 o'clock a. m. The defendant had no office at Williamston, and the agent at Princess Anne so notified the sender. He also told her that it would have to be sent by telephone, owned by another company, from Greenville to Williamston, for which a charge or toll of 25 cents would be made by that company. When the message was received by the operator at Greenville, "he put in a long-distance call for Mr. Barnes at Williamston, and he was informed that Mr. Barnes was not there, but in the woods four or five miles away; he being a lumberman." The operator of the defendant at once instructed the telephone operator "to keep in the call for Williamston"—that is, to get Mr. Barnes as soon as it could be done—but he did not return until about 5:30 o'clock p. m., when the message was communicated to him by telephone. The plaintiff alleges that had the message been delivered to him at 8 o'clock a. m. on November 26th, the day it was sent, he could have left by the 8:28 a. m. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company train, and reached his father's bedside 17 hours before his death, which occurred about 5 o'clock p. m. November 27, 1909. We do not well see how he could have done any such thing. It would seem to be a physical impossibility. By his own calculation, there would be only 28 minutes of time for the relay of the message at Greenville, and the delivery of it to him at Williamston, he being at the time, according to his own statement,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles from his home. Some time must be consumed in making the necessary connection between telegraph and telephone lines, and in making the call on the "long-distance phone" for him. He had to travel  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles to Williamston to catch the train. To charge the defendant with negligence under such circumstances would be anything but justice. Plaintiff says he could have taken the 4:30 p. m. train out of Williamston on November 26, 1909, and arrived at Princess Anne at 2:23 p. m. on November 27, 1909, a few hours before his father's death.

[1] But the crucial fact in the case is that plaintiff was not at home, but some distance therefrom, and this is what prevented an earlier delivery of the message. It was his misfortune, and not the defendant's fault, and plaintiffs fail so often to distinguish between the two. The service rendered to the plaintiff in the effort to reach him with the message was far more prompt and efficient than was the service in Marquette v. Telegraph Co., 153 N. C. 156, 69 S. E. 73, which we so recently held to be sufficient in law. We will hold these companies to a strict accountability in the performance of their duties and obligations to the public and their patrons, but we are impelled by our sense of justice to apply the law fairly and reasonably, and not to rule harshly and oppressively in regard to the measure of diligence required of them in the delivery of messages.

[2, 3] It is not mental anguish alone that entitles a plaintiff to recover, however much he may have suffered, but it must be coupled with the negligence of the company, and, too; that negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury as in other cases, and there must also be the absence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff directly or "in continuous sequence" contributing to his alleged injury, as in other cases. Brewster v. Elizabeth City, 137 N. C. 392, 49 S. E. 885, and especially Hauser v. Telegraph Co., 150 N. C. 557, 64 S. E. 503, and Hocutt v. Telegraph Co., 147 N. C. 186, 60 S. E. 980; 2 Joyce, Elec. Law, § 816a.

[4] Telegraph companies are only bound to the exercise of that degree of diligence which a man of ordinary prudence would use under like or similar circumstances. They must be prompt and diligent, it is true, but to demand more of them would be to apply a rule which would result sometimes, if not in the large majority of cases, in oppression and gross injustice. We will require of them their full duty, but no more. "If the plaintiff has lost, he has not been injured, as it is expressed in one of the maxims of the law." Gainey v. Telegraph Co., 136 N. C. 261, 48 S. E. 653.

[5] There was some question as to the right of the telephone company to disclose the contents of the message to a person other than the addressee. This could not be done without the consent of the sender and the sendee, or at least the sender or the sendee, depending upon the nature of the message or the terms of the contract. The telegraph company under its ordinary contract is not required to telephone a message, as it would impair the confidential relations assumed, but it can agree to deliver a message in this manner. 37 Cyc. 1683; Hellams v. Telegraph Co., 70 S. C. 83, 49 S. E. 12; Lyles v. Telegraph Co., 77 S. C. 174, 57 S. E. 725, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 534. It is a part of the undertaking of the telegraph company, with respect to the transmission and subsequent handling of the message, that its contents shall not be disclosed to any person whomsoever, without the consent of either the sender or addressee, and, if it does divulge the contents without being released from the obligation of secrecy, it acts at its peril. 37 Cyc. 1684; Cocke v. Telegraph Co., 84 Miss. 380, 36 South. 392. Nor has the company the right to deliver the message, especially by telephone, which necessarily discloses its contents, to one not the agent of the addressee to receive telegrams, unless he is otherwise expressly or impliedly authorized to receive it. W. U. Tel. Co. v. Mitchell, 91 Tex. 454, 44 S. W. 274, 40 L. R. A. 209, 66 Am. St. Rep. 906. We should carefully distinguish between the mode of delivery in respect to telegrams which are to be transmitted by telephone beyond the telegraph company's line and a delivery of the telegraphic message itself by the messenger of the transmitting company. Observing the distinction will reconcile some apparently conflicting decisions. In this case the telegraph company performed its full duty, and is not liable to the plaintiff.

[8] There is a stipulation in the contract of the defendant with its patrons that a claim or demand in writing must be presented to the telegraph company within 60 days after the message is filed for transmission. We have held this provision to be reasonable and valid. Sherrill v. Telegraph Co., 109 N. C. 532, 14 S. E. 94; Lewis v. Telegraph Co., 117 N. C. 436, 23 S. E. 319. In Sykes v. Telegraph Co., 150 N. C. 431, 64 S. E. 177, we said that "the validity of a stipulation as to presenting the plaintiff's claim (in writing) within 60 days after knowledge of the non-delivery of the message has been received by him is too well settled now to be longer questioned"—citing Jones on Telegraph and Telephone Companies, p. 380, § 395, and quoting therefrom a passage of the text giving the reasons for the validity of this term of the contract.

The judge was right in nonsuiting the plaintiff, and we affirm the judgment.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Ferguson, Judge.

W. D. McIver, for appellant. E. M. Green and Guion & Guion, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. According to plaintiff's evidence, he was driving a pair of mules across Neuse river bridge, a structure about a mile in length and 18 feet wide, perfectly straight. A few yards ahead when he first drove upon the bridge the defendant was crossing the bridge in an automobile, and when plaintiff had crossed probably one-half the bridge, going at the rate of about three miles an hour, he saw defendant returning and coming towards him at a rate of speed of about ten miles an hour. His mules showed signs of fright, whereupon the negro riding with him on the back of the cart, at the direction of plaintiff, signaled and called to the defendant, when at a distance of about 40 yards, requesting him to stop his machine. He came on, and, the mules becoming uncontrollable, plaintiff, an old man, was thrown to the floor of the bridge under the mules' feet, and the two wheels of the double horse wagon, with the negro upon the rear, passed over and across the small of his back, from which injury he sustained great suffering, and for several months was disabled to labor.

There was conflicting evidence as to the distance at which the plaintiff signaled the defendant, and also the speed at which the automobile was traveling. The defendant's evidence put the speed at less than five miles an hour, while the plaintiff's witnesses placed it at more than that. The defendant's testimony was that he could not have stopped his machine sooner without injury to occupants.

The judge read to the jury the statute regulating the operation of moving vehicles in the use of highways (Laws 1909, c. 445, §§ 9, 10, 11, 12), and gave a careful charge in accordance therewith, applying the law to the various phases of the facts as they might be found by the jury, in which charge we find no error.

The exception as to the form of the issues cannot be sustained, as upon them every phase of the controversy could be, and was, fairly submitted to the jury. Humphrey v. Church, 109 N. C. 137, 13 S. E. 793, and cases there cited. The exceptions of the defendant are largely addressed to the refusal of the court to grant a nonsuit and refusal to instruct the jury to answer each of the issues, seriatim, in favor of the defendant. In refusing to do so there was no error. The case is almost entirely one of fact, and was properly submitted to the jury, who evidently gave a moderate verdict. The judge cautioned them very properly that they were to give only compensatory damages, and nothing by way of punishment.

[1-3] He also instructed them that an automobile is not a nuisance in itself, and that it was not negligence per se for a person to use one in traveling along public highways and across public bridges, and that the owner is liable for damages only when caused by his negligence, that he is required to take notice that such machines are liable to scare horses along the highway, and he should keep a proper lookout not to cause any injury to others which could be avoided by proper care in the use of his machine.

No error.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1177*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error in claim and delivery proceedings to recover property claimed under a chattel mortgage, in which defendant counterclaimed, in requiring plaintiff to show that a certain sum was paid by plaintiff from the proceeds of defendant's property to discharge a mortgage at defendant's request, when payment of such sum was admitted by the pleadings, requires a new trial where it cannot be said from the record that the jury have not already allowed such amount to plaintiff, preventing the Supreme Court from crediting it upon defendant's recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4597-4620; Dec. Dig. § 1177.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by L. C. Carroll against Martha James and others, administrators. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

This is an action to recover personal property under a chattel mortgage executed by Caesar James, who is dead. The property was seized under claim and delivery proceedings issued in this action, and delivered to the plaintiff, and sold by him. The defendants are the administrator of Caesar James and his grandson. They allege in their answer that a part of the property seized was not embraced in the chattel mortgage; that other parts of the property were bought by the plaintiff at the sale under the mortgage for less than its value; and that after the death of Caesar James the plaintiff took into his possession and sold 5,000 pounds of tobacco belonging to James; and that he retained all of the proceeds of the sale of the tobacco, except $112, which he paid Y. Z. & A. O. Newberry at the request of the defendants. The sum of $112 paid to Newberry, at the request of the defendants, out of the proceeds of the sale of the tobacco, was due on an agricultural lien, executed by Caesar James to E. H. & J. A. Meadows, and transferred by them to Newberry. There was a controversy between the parties as to the amount of property that went into the hands of the plaintiff, its value, and as to the state of the account between them. The plaintiff, among other things, contended he was entitled to charge against the defendants the sum of $112 paid to Newberry. The court charged the jury on this contention as follows: "In order for the plaintiff to get credit for the amount of the Meadows mortgage, it was incumbent upon him to show what was due on the Meadows mortgage, because the mortgage was an agricultural lien. It was a promise to advance so much money, and not to exceed so much money, and, when the plaintiff saw fit to pay on the Meadows mortgage $112 in order to sustain that payment, it was necessary for him to show that Meadows had at that time advanced on that agricultural lien $112, including the interest that was due. There was no interest due on the Meadows claim until November 1, 1908." Plaintiff excepts. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The charge of his honor placing the burden on the plaintiff to prove the item of $112 is erroneous, and entitles the plaintiff to a new trial. It would have been correct but for the fact that the defendants allege in their answer that this sum was paid by the plaintiff out of the proceeds of the sale of the tobacco at the request of the defendants, and the plaintiff admits this in his reply.

[1] Being a fact admitted by the pleadings, it was not in controversy, and the burden was not on the plaintiff to establish it. The error was the result of an inadvertence, as is shown by the statement made by the presiding judge, which is attached to the case on appeal. He says that he overlooked the answer of the defendants as to the $112, and that his attention was not called to it.

[2] As the item is admitted, we would direct it to be credited on the amount recovered by the defendants, instead of ordering a new trial, if we had any means of ascertaining the decision of the jury with reference to it, but we cannot say on the record that it has not already been allowed, and, as the question was submitted to them erroneously, we must order a new trial.

New trial.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 20, 1911.)

2. DRAINS (§ 17*)—DRAINAGE COMMISSIONERS—APPOINTMENT.

General Drainage Law (Laws 1909, c. 442) § 19, provides that, after a drainage district is established, the court shall appoint three persons as drainage commissioners, who shall first be elected by a majority of the landowners, and that it shall appoint those receiving a majority of the votes. Laws 1909, c. 509, authorizes the establishment of a particular drainage district by the state board of education and certain landowners, and section 3 provides that two members of the board of drainage commissioners provided for in section 19 of the general drainage law shall be appointed by the state board of education and one appointed by the court before which the petition is filed. Held that, even if an actual election were necessary under section 19, and the court must appoint those as commissioners who received a majority of the votes, that provision is not applicable to the commissioner appointed by the court under section 3; the reference in that section to the general drainage law being only to indicate the number of commissioners and the nature of their duties, and not how they shall be appointed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hyde County; Allen, Judge.

Proceeding by the State, on relation of T. C. Mann, against T. H. B. Gibbs, to determine title to office. Defendant's motion to dismiss the action was denied, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

This action is brought to determine whether the relator, Mann, or the defendant, Gibbs, is a drainage commissioner in the drainage district for Mattamuskeet Lake and the lands adjoining thereto. The relator alleges that an election was held for drainage commissioner under chapter 442, § 19, Laws of 1909; that he and the defendant were the only candidates for the position; that he was legally elected; that a majority of the votes cast were in favor of the defendant, but that enough of these were illegal to change the result; that the clerk of Hyde county, before whom the petition for the drainage district was filed, appointed the defendant a commissioner; and that he, the relator, is eligible to the position and entitled thereto. The defendant denies that any illegal votes were cast for him, alleges that he was duly elected, and admits that he has been appointed by the clerk, under section 3, c. 509, Laws of 1909. The defendant moved to dismiss the action, and, upon the denial of his motion excepted and appealed.

Mann & Jones and E. F. Aydlott, for appellant. J. C. B. Ehringhaus and W. M. Bond, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] It requires no citation of authority to sustain the proposition that the appeal is premature and must be dismissed; but as both parties request it, and much expense may be saved by the determination of the right of the relator to maintain his action, if he sustains his allegation that he received a majority of the legal votes cast, we proceed to consider it. The question involves the construction of section 19 of chapter 442 of the Laws of 1909, and section 3 of chapter 509 of the Laws of 1909. The first of these statutes is a general law, applicable to the whole state, and is for the establishment of drainage districts upon petition filed before the clerk; while the second relates to a particular drainage district, and is "An act to authorize the state board of education to unite with certain landowners in Hyde county in establishing a drainage district, including Mattamuskeet Lake and the lands adjacent thereto." The language of the two sections, upon which the controversy arises, is as follows:

Chapter 442, § 19, Laws of 1909: "After the said drainage district shall have been declared established, as aforesaid, and the survey and plan therefor approved, the court shall appoint three persons, who shall be designated as the board of drainage commissioners. Such drainage commissioners shall first be elected by the owners of the land within the drainage or levee district, or by a majority of same, in such manner as the court shall prescribe. The court shall appoint those receiving a majority of the votes. If any one or more of such proposed commissioners shall not receive a vote of a majority of such landowners the court shall appoint all or the remainder from among those voted for in the election. Any vacancy thereafter occurring shall be filled in like manner."

Chapter 509, § 3, Laws of 1909: "Two members of the board of drainage commissioners provided for in section nineteen of the general drainage law shall be appointed by the state board of education and one appointed by the court before which the petition is filed. The corporate name of said district shall be 'Board of Drainage Commissioners of Mattamuskeet District,' and the State Treasurer shall be the ex officio treasurer of said board."

The contention of the relator is that the two statutes should be construed together, and that, when so construed, by correct interpretation, the provisions as to elections contained in the first are applicable to appointments made by the clerk under the second. In the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to pass upon the effect of an election under section 19 of chapter 442; but we incline to the opinion that it is commendatory in its nature and does not confer title. There is an absence of all the usual requirements attending elections for general or special purposes, and the qualifications of an elector are not those prescribed by the Constitution. The owners of land within the district, and no others, are entitled to vote, thereby excluding those who are not landowners from the right to vote, and including infants and married women who own lands. There is no provision for holding an election, for the count of the vote, for returns, or for declaring the result. We do not mean that no election can be held under a statute unless these regulations appear, but that the absence of them, when taken in connection with the language of the act and its purpose, indicates that by an election was meant a meeting of the landowners and an expression of their opinion, expecting the clerk to follow it. The latter part of section 19 adds force to this view: "If any one or more of such proposed commissioners shall not receive the vote of a majority of the landowners, the court shall appoint all or the remainder from those voted for at said election"—thus providing for the appointment of commissioners who are not the choice of a majority of the landowners.

[2] If, however, it be conceded that an election is necessary under section 19 of chapter 442, and the clerk must appoint one who receives a majority of the votes, we are of opinion that this provision is not incorporated in section 3 of chapter 509, and is not applicable thereto. The reference to the general drainage law in section 3 is for the purpose of indicating the number of commissioners and the nature of their duties, and not to designate how they shall be appointed or elected. The section says, without qualification, that two of the commissioners shall be appointed by the state board of education and one by the clerk. If it had been the intention of the Legislature for the clerk to make the appointment under the provisions of section 19, it would have been easy to add to the power conferred on the clerk, "as prescribed in section 19 of chapter 442," and not leave the matter to conjecture.

There was a reason for the difference in the two acts. Under the first, the landowners of the drainage district were the only parties interested, and it was right and advisable that their choice should be respected in the selection of commissioners; while under the second the state board of education was uniting with certain landowners to form a district, upon the understanding that the state board should name a majority of the commissioners. The plan, therefore, outlined in section 19, could not be applied to the new scheme, and another was adopted.

We conclude that the relator, upon the facts submitted, is not entitled to maintain his action. The appeal is dismissed as premature.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by C. J. De Bruhl against J. T. Hood. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Guion & Guion, for appellant. Moore & Dunn, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to enjoin the defendant from selling certain property under powers of sale contained in two mortgages, originally executed by plaintiff to Mrs. Sophia B. Duffy and the Citizens' Bank of Newbern, to secure notes of the plaintiff, and by them sold and transferred to the defendant. It is alleged in the complaint that several cash payments were made upon said indebtedness by the plaintiff, which, with the proceeds of certain timber cut from the land and received by the defendant, which, by reason of the contract between the parties, should have been applied to the debt, have reduced the amount thereof to $273.68, which sum was tendered by the plaintiff to the defendant, who refused to accept the same.

[1] No money was deposited in court in order to keep the tender good. It is the universal rule that, in order to constitute a valid and effectual tender, the party who makes it must allege and show that since the refusal to accept the money he has always been ready to pay the same, and must bring the amount of the tender into court; and it has been said that he should take a rule on the plaintiff, or party to whom the debt is due, to accept the same or proceed at his peril. Cope v. Bryson, 60 N. C. 112. In Bissell v. Heyward, 96 U. S. 580, 24 L. Ed. 678, it was said, with reference to a sufficient tender: "To have the effect of stopping interest or costs, a tender must be kept good; and it ceases to have the effect when the money is used by the debtor for other purposes."

[2] A plea of tender, not accompanied by proferret in curiam, is bad. Soper v. Jones, 56 Md. 503. The subject is fully discussed in Parker v. Beasley, 116 N. C. 1, 21 S. E. 955, 33 L. R. A. 231, with ample reference to the authorities. Justice Allen, in a very recent case decided by this court (Lee v. Manley, 154 N. C. 244, 70 S. E. 385), adopts the statement of Wilde, C. J., in Dixon v. Clark, 57 E. C. L. R. 376, as follows: "The principle of the plea of tender, in our apprehension, is that the defendant has been always ready (toujours prêt) to perform entirely the contract on which the action is founded, and that he did perform it, as far as he was able, by tendering the requisite money; the plaintiff himself precluding a complete performance by refusing to receive it. And as, in ordinary cases, the debt is not discharged by such tender and refusal, the plea must not only go on to allege that the defendant is still ready (uncore prêt), but must be accompanied by a proferret in curiam of the money tendered." The case of Dixon v. Clark was cited with approval, also, in Bank v. Davidson, 70 N. C. 122.

[3] The defendant in his answer insisted that the amount due upon the indebtedness secured by the mortgages was not $273.68, as alleged by the plaintiff, but a much larger sum, to wit, $1,180.96, and demanded the payment of that amount. The jury found that the true sum was neither of the said amounts, but $203. It was urged by the defendant in the court below that this verdict was erroneous, as he was entitled to recover at least $273.68, the amount of the tender. We do not see upon what ground any such claim can be based. The tender was rejected, and, as the money was not paid into court, it left the matter open and at large, the same as if no such tender had been made. The defendant should have taken the money when it was tendered, if he wished to avail himself of the tender. It is now too late for him to get the benefit of the same. The law will not compel the plaintiff to renew his tender, so that the defendant, who has submitted his cause to the jury and been defeated in his contention, may have another chance to accept it. This would be giving him two chances, to which he is not entitled, either in law or equity. Good faith requires that he be made to abide by his first decision. The fact that a greater sum was tendered than was actually due did not entitle the defendant to that sum if he rejected the offer, so as to prevent the court from ascertaining the true amount for which judgment should be given. In Glos v. Goodrich, 175 Ill. 20, 51 N. E. 643, the court, in dealing with a similar question, said: "The objection that the sum of $30 was tendered, and the decree only required the payment of $25.50, cannot be held well taken, because in a chancery proceeding the offer to bring the money into court and abide by the order of the court as to its payment is a sufficient tender, and, being incorporated in the bill, the court may find the actual amount due, and require that sum to be paid, and is not required to find a greater amount due than actually exists, because a tender for such greater sum had theretofore been made."

We see from this case that, even when the tender was held to be good and continuing, by reason of what was said to be equivalent to actual payment into court, the court has the right to find the correct amount and enter judgment for it, and not for the larger amount which was tendered; and a fortiori this can be done when the tender was made out of court and under the circumstances stated in this case. In Abel v. Opel, 24 Ind. 250, the court held that, while a tender is an admission of the amount due upon the debt, it is not conclusive, no more than any other admission of fact, and does not preclude the court from inquiring as to the true amount; nor does it exclude the consideration of all other evidence upon the subject, and, further, that if too much has been tendered, no obligation arises to pay the larger sum or to keep the tender good at that amount. That case was very much like this. The mortgagor tendered $1,440, when only the sum of $1,309 was found to be due, and it was held proper to enter judgment for the smaller amount, notwithstanding the tender. See, also, 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. pp. 15 and 16, title, "Tender as Admission of Liability."

The jury have decided against the defendant, mortgagee (who was oppressively demanding far more than he was justly entitled to recover), and upon evidence, as we think, sufficient to sustain the verdict, and there was no error committed during the trial which invalidates that verdict. We therefore affirm the judgment.

No error.

WHITFORD v. NORTH STATE LIFE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 20, 1911.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 436*)—ACTION BY EXECUTOR—VENUE.

Where a cause of action in a complaint by an administrator is not one which must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action is situated, as provided by Revisal 1905, § 419, nor one to be tried in the county where the cause arose within section 420, and section 421, relating to venue in actions brought against administrators, does not provide for actions by administrators, the administrator in the action in question was party plaintiff, authorizing the action to be brought in the county of his residence under Revisal 1905, § 424.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 436.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by G. A. Whitford, as administrator of the estate of W. B. Burgess, deceased, against the North State Life Insurance Company. Motion for change of venue was allowed, and the plaintiff excepted and appeals. Reversed.

The admitted facts are: (1) The plaintiff is G. A. Whitford, administrator of W. B. Burgess. (2) The defendant is a domestic corporation, whose principal place of business is in Lenoir county. (3) The action is to recover the amount of a life insurance policy. (4) The intestate Burgess was a resident of Lenoir county at the time of his death. (5) The plaintiff qualified as administrator in Lenoir county. (6) The plaintiff G. A. Whitford, is a resident of Craven county. The motion was allowed, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Gulon & Gulon, for appellant. Rouse & Land, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The cause of action alleged in the complaint is not one of those provided for in section 419, Revisal 1905, which must be tried in the county "in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof is situated," nor is it one of those mentioned in section 420, Revisal 1905, which are to be tried in the county "where the cause or some part thereof arose." The section requiring actions against administrators to be instituted in the county where the bond of the administrator is given has no application, because this is not an action against an administrator, but one brought by him.

As no provision is made elsewhere as to the place of trials of actions instituted by administrators, it follows that the controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant is dependent upon the construction of that part of section 424, Revisal 1905, saying: "In all other cases the action shall be tried in the county, in which the plaintiffs or the defendants, or any of them, shall reside at the commencement of the action."

The question is settled when we determine who are the parties to the record, because, if G. A. Whitford is the party plaintiff, he is a resident of Craven, and entitled to sue there. In our opinion, by proper construction of section 424, in connection with section 421, he is the party plaintiff, and the addition of "administrator of W. B. Burgess" to his name is merely descriptive of his title, or the capacity in which he sues. If this is not the correct view, and it was the intention of the Legislature that the place where letters of administration were taken out should determine the residence of the administrator, why is it that provision was not made in section 421 for actions by administrators as well as for actions against them? The clear inference from the last section is that it was the purpose of the Legislature to make a distinction between actions by and against administrators, and when it is said that actions against administrators shall be brought in the county where the bond is filed, and nothing is said as to actions by administrators, it excludes the idea that actions instituted by the administrator are necessarily to be brought in the county in which letters are granted.

The case of Rankin v. Allison, 64 N. C. 674, seems to be in accord with this view. In that case the action was brought in Caldwell county in the name of Jesse Rankin, guardian of John S. McRorie, against two defendants, one of whom was a nonresident of the state, and the other a resident of Iredell county. The answer alleged that John S. McRorie was a resident of Iredell county at the commencement of the action. The court treats the answer as an application for removal, and says: "We might regard the answer in this case as such an application: but then it does not allege that Rankin, the plaintiff of record, resides in Iredell county, and consequently, as for such a purpose the court can only look to the parties of record, it could not be allowed." Here there is a direct statement that the court can only look at the parties of record in deciding where the action shall be tried, and that Rankin, although suing as guardian of John S. McRorie, was the plaintiff of record. The same rule is stated in 18 Cyc. p. 912, as follows: "Actions which are transitory and not local in their nature need not be brought by a personal representative in the county where the estate is being administered."

We conclude that the order of removal was erroneous, and it is reversed.

Reversed.

NICHOLSON et al. v. EUREKA LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 27, 1911.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 372*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—ANCIENT WRITINGS—AUTHENTICATION.

Ancient documents, relevant to the inquiry, purporting to be 80 years old or more, and produced from a proper custody, are admissible in evidence without proof of the signature, and, if offered as a muniment of title, without evidence of possession or occupation under the document; but the presence or absence of occupation may be considered by the jury after their admission, for the presumption as to the authenticity of an ancient document is rebuttable.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING.

Any witness who, in the ordinary course of business, has seen a person write or received his writing, may give his opinion as to the genuineness of certain writing, and a witness who in the course of his duty had had occasion to note the handwriting in other ancient documents entirely free from suspicion may testify as to the authenticity of the signature to an ancient document in controversy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; J. S. Adams, Judge.

Trespass by P. A. Nicholson and another against the Eureka Lumber Company. There was a judgment for defendant, to which plaintiffs excepted and appealed. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Nicholson & Daniel, for appellants. Wiley C. Rodman, for appellee.

HOKE, J. On the trial it appeared that both parties claimed under Ruel Windley, deceased, who by his last will and testament, bearing date in 1854, made disposition of certain real estate as follows:

"I give and devise to my two grandsons, George C. Respass and John B. Respass, all of my river shore lands, lying on the North side of Pamlico River and known as the William Windley, deceased, lands excepting one hundred acres which I shall lend to Ruel W. Jordan and given to his children, and also except one hundred acres which I shall give to my friend, James Windley, and the rest of the said tract to be equally divided between the said George and John B. Respass.

"Item 2. I give and bequeath to my friend and relative, James Windley, for favors done me by him, the following tract of land lying near the waters of old Town Creek and beginning at or near the head of Ash Branch at an oak, and from thence south 80 east 17 poles to a corner; thence with William Windley's own line east one hundred and twenty-nine poles to a corner; thence north 15 west 66 poles to a corner stake in the Savannah; thence north 76 west 160 poles to a corner; thence south 10 east 16 poles to said Ash Branch, and then to beginning. Containing one hundred acres more or less, and was patented by William Windley, deceased, to have and to hold to him and his heirs in fee simple forever."

Plaintiff claimed the 100 acres devised in this will to James Windley under a deed from a surviving child and one of the devisees of said James, and defendant claimed under a deed from the said John B. Respass, to whom the said George Respass, codevisee had conveyed his interest, and which said deed purported to convey the land devised to John B. and George Respass, under said will of Ruel Windley, and, on matters relevant to this appeal, the issue as to title was made to depend largely on the correct location of this devise of 100 acres to James Windley, defendant alleging that plaintiff had failed to locate the said land at all, and that any correct location of same, if made, would not include the locus in quo.

[1] On this question of location there was evidence on part of plaintiff tending to fix the beginning corner of the 100 acres as a certain "oak at or near the head of Ash branch" as called for in the devise and subsequent deeds, and that the placing as contended for would result in locating this land so as to include the locus in quo, and, in rebuttal of this testimony, defendant offered, and same was received in evidence over plaintiff's objection, a certificate of survey for a land warrant and grant to Calvin Windley for 200 acres of land in Beaufort county. This certificate bearing date, or purporting to bear date, in 1841, contained a plat of land, with courses and distances, and was signed by Ruel Windley, surveyor and also the chainbearers, was without erasures or interlineations of any kind, and, as we understand the record, was the plat and survey accompanying a grant to Calvin Windley, of same date, for a tract of land in that neighborhood of the quantity stated, and was produced from the proper custody. This plat was introduced because it apparently showed a placing of Ash branch entirely different from that claimed by plaintiff, and tending to show that a correct location of the 100 acres would not cover the locus in quo. Before the same was admitted, John B. Respass, Jr., a witness for defendant, testified as follows: "Q. Do you know Ruel Windley's handwriting? A. I know it in this way: He raised my father, and was very much devoted to him, and often in looking over his papers, which I have now, my father would show me, and say, 'This is grandfather's signature.' Q. Have you seen a great deal of that writing? A. Yes, sir. Since I have been surveying I have seen quite a lot of it. By family reputation, my great-grandfather was a surveyor, and my father was a surveyor." A small map, marked "A," was handed to witness, and he was asked: "Q. Whose handwriting is this, if you know? A. That is Ruel Windley's from the source of information that I have. By the Court: Q. Do you mean to say that somebody told you that that identical paper was in Ruel Windley's own handwriting? A. Not this one. By Counsel for Defendant: Q. From the writing you have seen purporting to have been written by Ruel Windley is that, or is it not, his handwriting? A. Yes, sir; that is his handwriting."

On these facts and accompanying testimony, we are of opinion that the plat with the certificate was properly received in evidence, being admissible as an ancient document, and also by reason of competent testimony tending to show that the certificate just below the plat and giving the corners of same was signed or subscribed in the handwriting of Ruel Windley, deceased. It is well established that ancient documents—that is, documents relevant to the inquiry and bearing date or purporting to bear date at or before a period of 30 years prior to the time the same are offered in evidence—prove themselves; that is, they are admissible in evidence without the ordinary requirements as to proof of execution or as to handwriting, the recognized limitation being that they should be produced from proper or a natural custody and be free from suspicious circumstances, indicative of fraud, or invalidity (McKelvey on Evidence [2d Ed.] p. 440); these preliminary requirements being for the determination of the court. The principle is stated in Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence, as follows: "Where any document purporting to be 30 years old is produced from any custody which the judge in the particular case considers proper, it is presumed that the signature and every other part of such document which purports to be in the handwriting of any particular person is in that person's handwriting, and, in the case of a document executed or attested, that it was duly executed and attested by the persons by whom it purports to be executed and attested, and the attestation or execution need not be proved, even if the attesting witness is alive and in court. Documents are said to be in proper custody if they are in the place in which, and under the care of the person with whom, they would naturally be, but no custody is improper if it is proved to have had a legitimate origin, or if the circumstances of the particular case are such as to render such an origin probable."

This statement, copied with approval in 2 Elliott on Evidence, § 431, will be found very generally sustained, and applies, except where modified or restricted by statute, not only to deeds, but to wills, leases, letters, records, contracts, maps, certificates, and all other writings which are relevant to the inquiry and may need authentication. 3 Wigmore, § 2145; 2 Elliott, § 1333; Starkie on Evidence, § 521 et seq.; 2 A. & E. p. 322. Where such a document is offered as a muniment of title, it was formerly held that it should be fortified by some evidence of possession or occupation under and consistent with the purport of the instrument, a position referred to as prevailing in Plummer v. Baskerville, 36 N. C. 252-269, but the view which now more generally obtains does not seem to make this evidence of cotemporaneous or accompanying occupation a necessary requirement to the introduction of the paper, but its presence or absence is a relevant circumstance for the consideration of the jury after the same has been received in evidence; the presumption as to the authenticity of an ancient document being a rebuttable one. McKelvey on Evidence, p. 441; Wigmore on Evidence, § 2441; Starkie on Evidence, § 524; Wharton, Law of Evidence, 1353, 1359.

[2] Again, as stated, we think the testimony of John B. Respass, concerning the document, would require that the same be received in evidence. While the doctrine of opinion evidence, by what is in strictness termed a "comparison of handwriting," as a rule, is only permitted in this state in the case of expert witnesses, and then in a restricted line of cases, as shown in Tunstall v. Cobb, 109 N. C. 316, 14 S. E. 28, and Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 142, a witness, expert or other, who has acquired knowledge and formed an opinion as to the character of a person's handwriting from having seen such person write, or from having, in the ordinary course of business, seen writings purporting to be his, and which he has acknowledged or upon which he has acted or been charged, as in the case of business correspondence, etc., may give such opinion in evidence when a relevant circumstance. Pope v. Askew, 23 N. C. 16, 35 Am. Dec. 729; Stephen on Evidence, p. 98; Abbott's Trial Evidence, pp. 485, 486. And the position excluding proof of handwriting by comparison is now so far relaxed with us that, although a jury is not allowed to make comparisons for themselves (Fuller v. Fox, 101 N. C. 119, 7 S. E. 589, 9 Am. St. Rep. 27), a witness, expert or not, who has been properly allowed to express an opinion as to the handwriting of a given paper, on being shown a writing admitted to be genuine may "show the two papers to the jury, and, by making comparisons between them, explain and point out to the jury the similarity or difference between the two." Martin v. Knight, 147 N. C. 564, 61 S. E. 447. And the means of acquiring the requisite knowledge to enable one to form and express an opinion as to handwriting has in case of ancient documents and of necessity been extended to include a witness who, in the course of his duty, has had full opportunity and frequent occasion to observe and note the handwriting in other ancient documents, entirely free from suspicion, and states that he has thus been enabled to form a satisfactory opinion as to the handwriting of the ancient document in question. 3 Taylor's Evidence, Amer. notes, 1229, 21; Chamberlayne, Best on Evidence, p. 231; Starkie on Evidence, § 521. Writers on evidence usually refer to such testimony as coming only from expert witnesses, but we doubt if an examination of the decisions would justify the statement. The opinions in these cases, so far as examined, seem rather to lay stress on the fact as stated that the witness had charge and custody of numbers of documents, with full opportunity and frequent occasion to examine them, rather than the fact that a witness was in strictness and technically an expert. The Fitzwalter-Peerage Case, 10 C. & F. Rep. p. 193; Cantey v. Platt, 2 McCord (S. C.) 260; Sweigart v. Richards, 8 Pa. 436; Jackson v. Brooks, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 426. In this last case the doctrine is stated as follows: "Where witnesses to ancient writings are dead, and such a period of time has elapsed since the execution of the instruments that no person can be presumed to be living who can testify to the handwriting of the parties or witnesses, evidence by a witness verifying the signatures of the parties and witnesses is admissible, although his knowledge of such genuineness is derived solely from an inspection of other ancient writings having the same signatures, which have been treated and preserved as mementos of title to estates." And, generally, on the question of the admissibility of this evidence, Tuttle v. Rainey, 98 N. C. 513, 4 S. E. 475; Strother v. Lucas, 31 U. S. 763, 8 L. Ed. 573; Hogans v. Carruth, 19 Fla. 84; Floyd v. Tewksbury, 129 Mass. 362.

A proper application of these authorities fully support the ruling of the court in admitting the certificate and plat in question, and, as stated, on both grounds: (1) It was an ancient document, produced from a custody both reasonable and natural, and apparently without any fact or suggestion casting doubt or suspicion upon it. (2) The witness John B. Respass fully qualified himself to give an opinion as to the handwriting of Ruel Windley in testifying that he had had occasion and full opportunity to examine and note other ancient documents having Ruel Windley's signature in care and keeping of his father and himself, the son and grandson of Ruel Windley, and to observe and note his signature as surveyor to numerous papers coming under his inspection in the line of his duty.

[3] While we uphold the action of the court on the question suggested, the plaintiff is entitled to a new trial by reason of another exception duly entered for that the court over plaintiff's objection allowed the jury to take this plat and certificate to their room and inspect the same in their deliberations. This is contrary to our practice, and has been condemned in several decisions of the court. Williams v. Thomas, 78 N. C. 47; Outlaw v. Hurdle, 46 N. C. 150; Watson v. Davis, 52 N. C. 178-181. For this error, as stated, plaintiff is entitled to a new trial, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

BRADDY et ux. v. DAIL et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 20, 1911.)

1. GIFTS (§ 34*)—POWER OF OWNER.

The owner of property may give it with such restrictions as he sees fit, and his intention will be effectuated unless unlawful.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. §§ 68-71; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 202*)—CONSTRUCTION OF TRUST DEED—SALE OF TRUST PROPERTY—APPLICATION OF PROCEEDS.

A trust deed recited that grantor desired to provide for the support of his daughter, and that she enjoy the income of the realty described for life. He thereby conveyed it to the grantee named, as trustee, for the following purposes: First, to allow the daughter to occupy the premises, rent free, so long as she paid taxes, etc., and, upon her inability to do so, the trustee should rent the property, keep it repaired, insured, etc., and pay any surplus to the daughter; and, second, to convey the land to such persons as the daughter might designate, if in the trustee's judgment a change were desirable, and invest the proceeds in a suitable home for the daughter upon the same terms and conditions theretofore mentioned, and that upon the daughter's death the trust should cease, and the land be in fee simple to the grantor's heirs, if any be living. The daughter is one of six children, all of whom, except herself, are minors and heirs of the grantor, and was 16 years of age when the deed was executed, and is now 21, with an expectancy of 41.5 years, and the value of her life estate in the proceeds of the fair value of the land, $2,000, is $1,500. Held that, even if the daughter acquired an equitable life estate under the deed, she is not entitled to have the value of her life estate paid to her absolutely upon the sale of the land by the trustee; but he must reinvest the proceeds upon the same trusts as the original property was held, leaving it to pass to the grantor's heirs upon the daughter's death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Allen, Judge.

Action by E. A. Braddy and wife against George I. Dail, trustee, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs in this action are Rena M. Braddy, who before her marriage was Rena E. Thomason and a daughter of Macon B.

Thomason, and her husband, E. A. Braddy, and the defendants are George I. Dail, trustee, Beulah Thomason, Jasper Thomason, Laurence Thomason, Bonner Thomason, and Louise Thomason, the last five being children of Macon B. Thomason, and under the age of 21 years. Macon B. Thomason was formerly the owner of the land in controversy, and on the 6th day of April, 1906, he executed a deed in trust in the following words:

"North Carolina, Beaufort County.

"This indenture, made and entered into this the 6th day of April, 1906, by and between Macon B. Thomason and wife, Eliza L. Thomason, parties of the first part, and Geo. I. Dail, as trustee, party of the second part, all of the state of North Carolina, county of Beaufort, witnesseth: That whereas, said Macon B. Thomason is desirous of making provision for his daughter, Rena B. Thomason, now of the age of sixteen years, against future contingencies, and for the maintenance and support of the said Rena E. Thomason; and whereas, the said Macon B. Thomason is desirous that the said Rena E. Thomason should enjoy the proceeds, rents, and income of the real estate herein more particularly described during the natural life of the said Rena E. Thomason, free from liabilities or interference of any one whatsoever: Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and the sum of one dollar to him paid by the party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the first part has bargained, sold, and conveyed, and by these presents doth bargain, sell, and convey, unto the said party of the second part, as trustee, all that certain lot of land situate in the city of Washington, N. C., bounded and described as follows: [A full description is given.] To have and to hold the above mentioned and described premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said Geo. I. Dail, trustee, his successors and assigns, in trust, and upon the uses, trusts, and purposes hereinafter mentioned, viz.: First. To allow the Rena E. Thomason to occupy the said premises free of rent so long as she can pay the taxes and assessments and repairs upon said premises. Should she be unable to do so, then Geo. I. Dail, trustee, will take charge of the premises, and rent the property, collect and receive the rents, and out of the same to keep the premises in good order and repair, properly insured, and pay all the taxes, assessments, and charges that may be imposed thereon, and the surplus pay to the said Rena E. Thomason, and take her receipt therefor, which will serve as a proper voucher to the said Geo. I. Dail, trustee. Second. To convey the said land and premises to such persons or person as she, the said Rena E. Thomason, may designate, if in the judgment of Geo. I. Dail, trustee, it is desirable to make a change. And invest the proceeds of such sale in a suitable home for my said daughter, upon the same terms and conditions as hereinbefore mentioned. And the said Macon B. Thomason hereby declares that upon the decease of the said Rena E. Thomason the said trusts hereby created shall cease and determine, and the land and premises above described shall be in fee simple absolute to the heirs at law of the said Macon B. Thomason, if any should be living. And the said party of the second part doth hereby signify his acceptance of this trust, and does hereby covenant and agree to and with the said party of the first part faithfully to discharge and execute the same according to the true intent and meaning of these presents. In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

"M. B. Thomason. [Seal.]

"Eliza X L. Tomason. [Seal.]" mark

The plaintiffs and George I. Dail, trustee, purporting to act under said deed, have sold the land conveyed therein to Junius D. Grimes for $2,000, which is a full and fair price for the same. The plaintiff, Rena E. Braddy contends that an equitable estate for life in said land was conveyed to her by said deed, and that she is entitled to have the value of the same ascertained and paid over to her, to be used as she sees fit. The defendants deny that the deed to said Grimes is valid, but contend, if it does convey a good title, that the whole fund must be re-invested.

His honor held that the deed of the plaintiffs and said trustee to said Grimes conveyed an estate in fee, and further adjudged: "(2) That the said Geo. I. Dail, trustee, has no power to pay to the plaintiffs the value of the life estate of the said Rena E. Braddy, but is directed to reinvest the said sum of $2,000, the proceeds of sale to Grimes, in its entirety in another piece of property, such as he may deem proper, the title to be taken upon the identical uses and trusts set out in the deed from Macon B. Thomason and wife to Geo. I. Dail, trustee, recorded in Book 138, page 475, of the Beaufort County Records."

The plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

Ward & Grimes, for appellants. C. H. Harding, for appellee guardian ad litem. Small, McLean & McMullan, for appellee Dail.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is not clear that the plaintiff Rena E. Braddy is entitled to a life estate in the land in controversy under the deed in trust. No estate, legal or equitable, is in terms conveyed to her, and a construction would be permissible that it was the purpose of the grantor to give her the rents and profits of the land for her support, and no more. This question is not, however, raised by the appeal, and the case of Cox v. Jernigan, 154 N. C. 584, 70 S. E. 949, seems to sus-tain the contention of the plaintiff as to the extent of her interest.

[1] Conceding, therefore, that she acquired an equitable estate for life under the deed, we are of opinion that this does not confer on her the right to have the value of this interest ascertained and delivered to her for her own use. As was said in Cox v. Williams, 58 N. C. 154, the owner of property "has the right to give it with such restrictions and upon such terms as he sees proper, and the courts are bound to carry his intentions into effect, unless there be something unlawful and against public policy." We find nothing unlawful or against public policy in the deed, and the language used, as it seems to us, admits of but one construction as to the question in controversy. The land is conveyed to the trustee in fee, under the act of 1879, and the trusts specifically declared. Authority is given to the trustee to convey to such person as the said Rena E. may designate; but this power is limited by the provision that the trustee must first determine that a change is desirable, so that the plaintiff cannot compel a conveyance against his judgment, honestly exercised. The conveyance authorized is evidently one to consummate a sale of the property, as in the same sentence conferring the power the trustee is directed "to invest the proceeds of such sale." The proceeds are to be invested in a suitable home for the plaintiff, to be held "upon the same terms and conditions as hereinbefore mentioned," and upon the death of the plaintiff the trust is to determine, and "the land and premises above described" are to belong to the heirs of the grantor "in fee simple absolute."

[2] If the grantor had the right to dispose of his property as he wished, he could direct that it be sold, and, if sold, that the proceeds be invested on such terms as he thought wise and just. He could give the use of it to the plaintiff during her life, and direct that it be held in its original form or as reinvested until her death, and then that it go to his heirs. The language indicates clearly that this was his intention. He does not say that a part of the land shall go to the heirs, but "the land and premises above described," meaning all of it.

If the construction contended for by the plaintiff should be adopted, a serious injustice might arise. The plaintiff is one of six children, all of whom are heirs of the grantor. At the time the deed was executed, in 1906, she was 16 years of age, and is now 21, and has an expectancy of 41.5 years. The value of her life estate in the proceeds of the sale of the land ($2,000), based on her expectancy, would be about $1,500. If this should be ascertained and turned over to her, and she should die within a year, the money would belong to her husband, and the five minor children, for whom the grantor intended property of the value of $2,000, would get $500.

We think the judgment was in accordance with law, and it is in all respects affirmed. Affirmed.

CARSON v. BLOUNT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 27, 1911.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 255*)—REFRESHING MEMORY—ACCOUNT BOOKS.

A witness who made the entries in an account book may use the book to corroborate his testimony, and refresh his memory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 874-890; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 113*)—COMPETENCY—MARKET VALUE.

Where the market value of cotton at a certain point was in controversy, testimony as to the market value at a point six miles distant was competent, though the witness testifying did not know the value of cotton at the place where the controversy arose.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 217*)—ADMISSIONS BY PARTIES—RELEVANCY.

Plaintiff contended that defendant purchased his cotton, agreeing to pay him the Norfolk market price at any date plaintiff wished to close it out, and offered the testimony of a witness that defendant told him that he had shipped the plaintiff's cotton and offered to ship the witness' cotton under an arrangement, whereby it might be held in Norfolk, and closed out at any time. Held, that this testimony was relevant and admissible, as tending to raise an inference that defendant had shipped plaintiff's cotton under the same arrangement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by J. J. Carson against M. O. Blount. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded in part.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract in the sale of cotton and cotton seed. These issues were submitted:

"(1) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff on account of the cotton as alleged; if so, in what amount?" Answer: "No."

"(2) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff on account of the cotton seed as alleged; if so, in what amount?" Answer: "No."

From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appealed.

Harry Skinner, Julius Brown, and F. C. Harding, for appellant. F. G. James & Son and Albion Dunn, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The complaint sets out two distinct causes of action: (1) Breach of contract on account of certain cotton sold to defendant by plaintiff. (2) Breach of contract on account of certain cotton seed sold to defendant by plaintiff.

We will consider the second cause of action first. The plaintiff contends that he delivered 946 bushels of cotton seed to the defendant during the fall of 1909 under agreement that settlement would be made therefor on any day called for by plaintiff at the market price on such day, that he demanded settlement on December 28, 1909, when the market price of seed was 55 cents per bushel, but received therefor only the sum of 45 cents, and brings this action to recover the difference. The defendant admits the purchase of the seed, but denies that he agreed to take the seed on the terms contended by plaintiff. Defendant avers that he agreed to take the seed and pay plaintiff the market price for same as they were delivered, and allow him 50 cents per ton in addition; that from the opening of the market there was a gradual rise in the price of seed during the fall; that plaintiff became dissatisfied with the contract as made, and that on December 8th, in order to settle the controversy, he offered to give and plaintiff accepted 45 cents per bushel for all seed delivered to that time; that this was the market price on this day, and plaintiff was given credit as of that day for said seed.

Upon this cause of action two errors are assigned:

[1] First. In that the court committed error in permitting the defendant to introduce the seed book of defendant, showing the prices paid by defendant for cotton seed during the fall and winter of 1909 and 1910, and permitting the witness Buroughs to testify to same over the objection of plaintiff. This exception cannot be sustained. The entries in the book were made by Buroughs himself, and it was competent to use them to corroborate that witness. This has been frequently decided. Nell v. Childs, 32 N. C. 195; Davenport v. McKee, 94 N. C. 326; Greenleaf, Ev. § 436 et seq. But as the contest was over the price to be paid for the seed, and not over the quantity delivered, we fail to see the materiality of the evidence.

[2] Second. In that the court committed error in permitting defendant's witness Ashburn, manager of Conetoe Oil Mills, over the objection of the plaintiff, to testify to the market price of cotton seed at Conetoe during the course of the fall season of 1909, after the witness had previously stated that he did not know the price of cotton seed at Bethel. It is admitted that Conetoe is on same railway, and only six miles from Bethel. We think the evidence competent to establish the general market price of cotton seed in that section of the country, and to corroborate defendant's contention that it did not exceed 45 cents per bushel on December 8th at Bethel. It is not conclusive evidence of the price at the latter place. We find no error in the trial of the second cause of action.

[3] As to the first cause of action, there is only one assignment of error, viz., in that the court committed error in excluding the following testimony of plaintiff's witness R. D. Whitehurst: "That in the fall of 1909 witness had conversation with defendant about Carson's cotton, in which defendant told witness he had shipped Carson's cotton. Blount said to me: 'You are putting your cotton in the yard and letting it rot. I have got a proposition for you. Instead of letting your cotton lie in the yard and rot, I will take it and ship it, and give you weights and grades, and ship it to Norfolk, you pay storage and freight, and you can close out any day you please at Norfolk prices. I have shipped J. J. Carson.'" The plaintiff contends that the defendant agreed to pay him the Norfolk market price for his cotton on any day plaintiff wished to close it out; that defendant misrepresented the Norfolk price, and settled for 23 bales at 15½ cents per pound, when, in fact, on that day the Norfolk market price was 16¼ cents per pound. The defendant denies the contract as well as the misrepresentation.

The evidence was excluded upon the ground that it was irrelevant, and tended to prove nothing. It is said in 16 Cyc. 939: "A voluntary and certain statement, oral or written, of the existence of any relevant matter of fact, is competent evidence against the party by whom or by whose authority it is made as a fact tending to show the truth of the statement." This is not an attempt to prove that, because A. made a contract with B. for the sale of his cotton on a certain date, he therefore made a similar contract with C. because made on same date and concerning the same subject-matter. Thompson v. Exum, 131 N. C. 111, 42 S. E. 543.

The plaintiff contends that in talking to Whitehurst about shipping his cotton it was irrelevant and unnecessary to refer to the shipment of Carson's cotton, unless for the purpose of producing on Whitehurst's mind the impression that the defendant had shipped Carson's cotton on the same terms then offered Whitehurst. We think the inference a legitimate one; and, while the jurors may or may not draw it, the evidence should have been submitted for what it is worth. This conversation with Whitehurst is not exactly substantive evidence, which standing alone would be sufficient to support a verdict, but it is a circumstantial fact from which an inference may be drawn tending to corroborate the plaintiff's version of the contract. As pertinently said by counsel in their brief: "What did Blount mean if not that he had shipped J. J. Carson's cotton on the same terms which he was then offering witness? It might have meant a great deal to the witness that defendant had offered the same proposition to the plaintiff, or any other man of good judgment, and that it had been accepted; but without this meaning does the statement made under the existing circumstances amount to anything? And, if we in simple manner reason thus, why not the jury?"

We think the court erred in excluding the evidence, for which error we direct a new trial upon the first issue. Let the costs of this court be equally divided.

Partial new trial.

BAILEY v. MATTHEWS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 27, 1911.)

1. DISCOVERY (§ 55*)—APPLICATION—AFFIDAVIT.

Where plaintiff applied under Revisal 1905, § 865, for an order for the examination of one of the defendants, to ascertain facts necessary to be known to file his complaint for libel, but did not file an affidavit, the application was properly denied, for such an application, being based upon extrinsic facts and not matters of record, should be supported by proof, and its good faith should be attested by oath.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Discovery, Cent. Dig. §§ 68-70; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. DISCOVERY (§ 61½, New, vol. 7, Key No. Series)—PLACE OF EXAMINATION.

An examination of a party before trial should be had in the county of his residence, under Revisal 1905, § 866.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Ward, Judge.

Action by W. S. Bailey against John C. Matthews and others. From an order denying plaintiff's application for an examination of one of the defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Grantham, for appellant. Bunn & Spruill and Jacob Battle, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action seems to have been brought by the plaintiff against his wife, Mrs. Ella Frances Bailey (née Ella Frances Finch), Susie Nelson Finch, step-daughter of plaintiff (now Susan N. Hester, wife of Dr. Joseph Hester), and others, to recover damages for a libel committed in conspiring with each other to make, and in making, fraudulent, libelous, and slanderous charges of and concerning the plaintiff, who at the time was postmaster at Spring Hope, N. C., for the purpose of preventing the Post Office Department at Washington, D. C., from issuing a commission to him as postmaster; John C. Matthews, one of the defendants, acting postmaster at Spring Hope, being a rival candidate for the said appointment. We gather this much from the unsworn statement of the plaintiff; no complaint having been filed. The plaintiff appealed to the court below for an order for the examination of one of the defendants, Mrs. Susie N. Hester, under Revisal 1905, § 865, before the clerk of the superior court of Nash county, on March 9, 1911, in order that he might ascertain facts necessary to be known for the purpose of preparing and filing his complaint. Mrs. Hester objected to the granting of the order, upon the following grounds: (1) The summons was served upon her in Halifax county, she now being a resident of Wake county, and therefore she cannot be compelled, by order of the court, to submit to examination in Nash county, under Revisal, § 866. (2) No complaint has been filed, and no affidavit, showing the nature or probable nature of the cause of action, or other facts entitling the plaintiff to the relief he seeks. (3) If the action is for libel, and as she cannot be compelled to discover any matter or any facts which would incriminate her or tend to do so, and as she claims her constitutional privilege exempting her from examination in such a case, and as any testimony that she could give in this cause would necessarily tend to that result, the plaintiff is not entitled to an order for her examination, under Revisal, § 865.

[1] We are of the opinion that the second ground of objection is a valid one, and that the order of T. A. Sills, clerk of the superior court (affirmed by the judge), was right, though their decision was based, not upon the reason we now give for its correctness, but upon the third of the grounds assigned by the respondent. It is the general rule, and the custom in judicial proceedings, that a motion for an order should be based upon an affidavit stating the facts which entitle the mover to the order for which he asks, and the reason of the thing fully justifies the rule. It is said by the text-writers that, "where a motion is founded upon extrinsic facts, and not solely upon matters apparent upon the face of the record or proceeding, it must, of course, be supported by evidence or proof" (14 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. 147), though, in passing upon this kind of proof, the ordinary rules of evidence are not strictly observed. The form of this proof may vary with the particular nature of the case. Affidavits, depositions or admissions in pleadings may be considered, but the usual form of the proof is an affidavit; that is, the evidence must be under oath. It is again said, in 14 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. at page 158: "Where the right to the relief sought is based upon facts not apparent of record, the existence of such facts must be proved by affidavits or other competent evidence. And conversely, where the motion is grounded solely upon matters apparent upon the face of the record or proceeding, it need not be thus supported." And again: "In practice affidavits are most frequently used to initiate legal proceedings, and to further the various stages therein, to certify and prove the service of process, or other matters relating to the proceedings in a cause, and to support or oppose motions, in cases where a court determines matters in a summary way, and for various other purposes." 1 Enc. Pl. & Pr. at page 333. Numerous cases are cited in the notes to these passages, sustaining the rule as thus stated. In a proceeding of this kind, it is of the first importance that the application for an order of examination should be under oath, stating facts which will show the nature of the cause of action, so that the relevancy of the testimony may be seen, and the court may otherwise act intelligently in the matter; and it should appear, in some way or upon the facts alleged, that it is material and necessary that the examination should be had, and that the information desired is not already accessible to the applicant. It should also appear that the motion is made honestly and in good faith, and not maliciously; in other words, that it is meritorious. 8 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. p. 41 et seq. Surely a clerk or judge is not bound to grant such an order if it appears to be unnecessary, or if the evidence sought to be elicited is immaterial, or the application appears to be made in bad faith. It is but just and right that the application should be made under the obligation and responsibility of an oath to protect the respondent against false and malicious accusations and vexatious proceedings. The law will not permit a party to spread a dragnet for his adversary in the suit, in order to gather facts upon which he may be sued; nor will it countenance any attempt, under the guise of a fair examination, to harass or oppress his opponent. It is a very rare case that requires the exercise of this function of the court, and the order should not be made without careful consideration and scrutiny. 8 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. 35 et seq. In Jenkins v. Putnam, 106 N. Y. 272, 12 N. E. 613, the court said: "Where the judge can see that the examination is sought merely for annoyance or for delay, and that it is not in fact necessary and material, he ought not to be required, and cannot absolutely be required, to make the order." Whether this provision of the statute is mandatory or not, we do not decide. It is sufficient now to hold that the order in this case should not have been made without a proper affidavit to sustain it. In some states, notably New York, the statutes are very stringent in their provisions, and require a detailed affidavit fully setting out the facts upon which the right to the examination is claimed. Stovers' N. Y. Anno. Code (6th Ed.) § 872, and notes; 16 Am. Digest (Century Ed.) p. 2058, § 65, where the cases are collected.

[2] It would seem that the party should be examined in the county of his residence.

Revisal, § 866. The other question, as to the privilege of the respondent arising out of the criminatory nature of the testimony, need not be considered at this time, for the purpose of a decision upon it, though it may be proper to refer to the statement of the doctrine in 8 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. 49: "A party cannot be forced to answer questions which tend to criminate him or to subject him to a statutory penalty. It is held in some cases, however, that he cannot on this ground resist an application for an order for his examination, but may avail himself of his privilege at the time the objectionable questions are propounded to him; while in others it is held that, if the only material evidence sought is criminating, the examination will not be allowed; otherwise the party will be left to his privilege at the examination, and this seems to be the general rule." It might be difficult sometimes to determine, in advance of the actual examination, whether or not the testimony proposed to be elicited will tend to criminate the party to be examined, but we express no opinion in regard to the question, as it may not arise again, and if it does we prefer to give it more careful study before reaching a conclusion.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Justice, Judge.

Action by J. C. Boss against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another. From a judgment against the defendant named, it appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover damages for injury to household goods while in the course of transportation. The defendants are the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company.

The goods were shipped from Washington, D. C., on the 20th of October, over the Washington & Southern Railroad Company, which issued the bill of lading, to Richmond, and thence by the Atlantic Coast Line to Plymouth and from Plymouth over the Norfolk Southern Railroad to Elizabeth City. They arrived at Plymouth on the 23d of October, when the Atlantic Coast Line at once notified its connecting line, the Norfolk Southern, of their arrival, but the last company, under the direction of the plaintiff, refused to receive the car until November 12th, when it did receive it and carried it over its line to Elizabeth City, a distance of 52 miles; that it arrived in Elizabeth City on November 13th, on schedule time, in about 24 hours after it left Plymouth. When the car reached Plymouth, and likewise when it was delivered by the Atlantic Coast Line to the Norfolk Southern Railroad for shipment to Elizabeth City, the original seal was unbroken, and the car was received without exception or protest by the Norfolk Southern. The plaintiff notified the Norfolk Southern Company not to accept the car when it arrived at Plymouth, because of an overcharge of freight.

The plaintiff testified that the goods were well packed and crated when delivered to the Washington & Southern Railroad, at Washington, D. C.; that they were received at Elizabeth City about four weeks after shipment over the Washington & Southern Railroad. "The original seals were unbroken, and the Norfolk Southern agent broke the seals and sent a man with me to look in. Found the back end of the car nearly empty. The furniture, etc., was piled in front end broken and defaced, and looked as if it had been in a collision. The car was an Atlantic Coast Line car."

The Norfolk Southern Company introduced the following evidence:

One Nicholson, agent at Plymouth of the Norfolk & Southern, testified that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company brought the car to Plymouth, with charges $50.40. "I received the car finally by instruction of Mr. Garrett, the Norfolk Southern agent at Elizabeth City, and shipped it immediately (November 12th) to Elizabeth City, where it arrived next day (13th). The car remained in Plymouth 10 or 15 days; came there on the 23d of October, and offered to me the same day, and for lack of credentials I did not take it, because charges were not prepaid or guaranteed. It stayed on the side track. The distance from Plymouth to Elizabeth City is 52 miles. When I forwarded the car to Elizabeth City, the original seals on the car were unbroken."

One Garrett, agent of the Norfolk Southern at Elizabeth City, testified that he told plaintiff the car was at Plymouth when it arrived there, and what charges were against it. Plaintiff directed him not to receive it. "In about a week (November 12th) I wired, at plaintiff's direction, to receive it, and on the 13th it arrived in Elizabeth City on schedule time. The distance from Elizabeth City to Plymouth is 52 miles. It came in about 24 hours or less."

One Bernard testified that he was flagman on train between Plymouth and Mackey's Ferry, which had plaintiff's furniture in charge; that he saw it landed on the steamer Garrett at Mackey's Ferry, en route to Elizabeth City, but that he stopped there and went no further; the distance being 11 miles from Plymouth on the way to Elizabeth City. He further testified that no accident or injury occurred to this car while he was with it, but he knew nothing about it after it left Mackey's Ferry on its route to Elizabeth City.

The Atlantic Coast Line Company introduced no testimony whatever, and there was no further testimony introduced by the plaintiff or the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company.

His honor, among other things, charged the jury: "That primarily the law raises the presumption that the injury, if you find injury to the plaintiff's property, occurred while in the hands of the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company, and it would devolve on it to rebut the presumption by proof that it did not injure the goods. If, however, you find by the greater weight of the evidence that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad had the goods and brought the same to Plymouth, and there turned the same over to the Norfolk Southern Railroad; and if you further find as a fact that the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company did not cause the injury and find that the presumption has been rebutted, then and in that case the presumption would arise that the damage occurred while the goods were in the hands of the Atlantic Coast Line, and it would devolve upon the Atlantic Coast Line to rebut that presumption by showing that the injury was not caused by it, being a matter peculiarly within its own knowledge."

The Atlantic Coast Line Company does not challenge the correctness of the legal principle involved in this charge, but does except upon the ground that there is no evidence to rebut the presumption that the Norfolk Southern Company caused the injury. The same question is also presented by a motion to nonsuit, and by a prayer for instruction.

The jury rendered the following verdict: "First. Was the plaintiff's furniture and goods injured by the negligence of the receivers of the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No. Second. Was the plaintiff's furniture and goods injured by the negligence of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes. Third. What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $276.25. Delay of goods, $15.00. Total, $291.25."

Judgment was entered against the Coast Line Company, and it excepted and appealed.

Pruden & Pruden, for appellant.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The goods were found, in a damaged condition, in the possession of the Norfolk Southern Company, and his honor properly held that this raised the presumption that they were injured by the negligence of that company. Manufacturing Co. v. Railroad, 121 N. C. 514, 28 S. E. 474; Manufacturing Co. v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 284, 38 S. E. 894; Meredith v. Railroad, 137 N. C. 488, 50 S. E. 1. This presumption was sufficient, standing alone, and in the absence of other testimony, to sustain a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. If evidence in rebuttal was offered, it was for the jury to determine its weight.

[2] Recognizing this as a correct statement of the law, the Norfolk Southern Company has introduced evidence which, it contends, rebuts the presumption of negligence on its part. Has it done so? If it has, there is no error in the trial. The evidence is not as full as it ought to have been, and the failure of the Norfolk Southern Company to introduce one of its own employés on the train, to show that there was no accident or collision between Mackey's Ferry and Elizabeth City, ought to have had weight with the jury. We cannot, however, pass on the sufficiency of the evidence. This is for the jury, and our duty ceases when we inquire whether there was evidence for their consideration. We think there was.

The goods were securely packed and crated at Washington city, and when they reached Elizabeth City the back end of the car was nearly empty, and the furniture was piled in the front end, broken and defaced. This would indicate that the injury did not occur in the ordinary operation of the train. No one could afford to ship furniture, nor would railroads be willing to accept it for carriage, if such damage usually occurred in the prudent management of their trains. The plaintiff testified, without objection, that the furniture looked like it had been in a collision.

The Norfolk Southern Company offered evidence that the original seal on the car was unbroken, thus explaining its acceptance of the car without protest, and that it received the car on November 12th, and delivered it at Elizabeth City on November 13th, on schedule time. The car was in the possession of the Coast Line Company from ten to fifteen days, and in the possession of the Norfolk Southern one day, and it had been transported by one from Richmond to Plymouth, and by the other 52 miles. The goods were in a car of the Atlantic Coast Line, and the seals were unbroken.

If there was evidence against the Coast Line Company that the injury was caused by an extraordinary event; that the car was in the possession of this company 10 or 15 days; that it transported the goods from Richmond to Plymouth, a distance of about 150 miles; that the goods were delivered at Washington to the Washington & Southern Railway, and arrived at Plymouth in a Coast Line car; and evidence in favor of the Norfolk Southern Company that it received the car on November 12th and delivered it on November 13th, at Elizabeth City, on schedule time, having possession of the car one day and carrying it 52 miles; and that the original seal was unbroken, was it not permissible to contend that the probabilities were greater that the injury occurred while in possession of the Coast Line Company. There was evidence of these facts, and if, accepting them as true, the probability of injury by the Coast Line Company was more reasonable it was for the jury to say what inference should be drawn from them. Fitzgerald v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 584, 54 S. E. 391, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 337.

[3] The evidence is not conclusive, and the jury would have been justified in finding that the presumption of negligence raised against the Norfolk Southern had not been rebutted; but we cannot say there was no evidence to support the verdict and judgment.

No error.

HARDY et al. v. MITCHELL

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 27, 1911.)

BILLS AND NOTES (§ 539*)—ACTION ON NOTE—VERDICTS—INCONSISTENT FINDINGS.

In an action on a note, the jury found that it had been indorsed to plaintiffs in due course before maturity, and that the note was not given for a valuable consideration, but the plaintiffs had no notice of such fact when they purchased the note. The judge set aside the finding of the jury as to notice, and submitted such issue to a second jury, who found that plaintiffs had notice of the want of consideration at the time of the purchase. Such finding was not set aside, but judgment was rendered for plaintiffs. Held that, under Revisal 1906, § 2201, under the first finding plaintiffs were holders in due course, entitled to judgment, and under the finding of the second jury defendant was entitled to judgment; section 2176 making the absence of consideration a defense to one having notice thereof, and, the findings being inconsistent, the verdict must be treated as void, and the judgment set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 539.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Greene County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by R. H. Hardy and another against N. C. Mitchell. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. P. Frizzelle and G. V. Cowper, for appellant. L. V. Morrill and Aycock & Winston, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. This action was instituted to recover the amount of a note for $250, executed by the defendant to J. T. Canady, and indorsed by him to R. G. Canady and by R. G. Canady to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs allege that they purchased said note before it was due, and that they are the holders thereof in due course. The defendant alleges that the note was without consideration, and that the plaintiffs had notice of this infirmity at the time they bought it. At May term, 1910, of the superior court, the action came on for trial, and the following verdict was rendered by the jury:

"(1) Was the note indorsed to plaintiffs in due course before maturity?" Answer: "Yes."

"(2) Was the note given for a valuable consideration?" Answer: "No."

"(3) If not, did plaintiffs have notice of such want of consideration at the time they purchased the note, if they did purchase the same?" Answer: "No."

"(4) Was the note sued on purchased by fraud and under circumstances against public policy, as set out in the answer?" Answer: "No."

The judge who presided at said term, in the exercise of his discretion, set aside the finding of the jury on the third issue, and ordered that it be tried anew, and declined to set aside the findings on the first, second, and fourth issues. The action again came on for trial at May term, 1911, of said court, and the jury answered the third issue, "Yes." The judge who presided did not set aside the finding of the jury, but rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. In this condition of the record, a new trial must be ordered of the issues raised by the pleadings, because of the inconsistent findings of the two juries. The first jury has found, in response to the first issue, that the plaintiffs are the holders of the note in due course, and, if so, they purchased it for value, before it was due and without notice of any infirmity. These are necessary elements to constitute one a holder in due course, as is shown by Revisal 1905, § 2201: "Sec. 2201. What Constitutes a Holder in Due Course. A holder in due course is a holder who has taken the instrument under the following conditions: (1) That the instrument is complete and regular upon its face; (2) that he became the holder of it before it was overdue and without notice that it has been previously dishonored, if such was the fact; (3) that he took it for good faith and value; (4) that at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it." The first jury also says there was no valuable consideration given for the note, and the second jury finds that the plaintiffs had notice of the want of consideration at the time of their purchase.

Under section 2176 of the Revisal absence of consideration is a defense against any one not a holder in due course. In other words, the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment on the first issue, because it involved the finding that they were purchasers for value, before due and without notice of any infirmity, and the defendant was entitled to judgment on the second and third issues, finding that the note was without consideration, and that the plaintiffs had notice of the infirmity. As was said in Kornegay v. Kornegay, 109 N. C. 191, 13 S. E. 772, in reference to inconsistent findings of a jury: "In such a state of uncertainty, the verdict must be treated as void, and a new trial directed to be had."

New trial.

NEW BERN BANKING & TRUST CO. v. DUFFY et al.

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 514*)—ACTION ON NOTE—CORPORATE EXISTENCE—ALLEGATION.

Where it appeared from the allegations of the complaint of a corporation on a note transferred to it that the payee indorser dealt with the plaintiff as if it had lawful right to contract with him, impliedly admitting that it was a corporation by indorsing the note to it, the complaint was not demurrable for failure to allege plaintiff's corporate existence.

2. PLEADING (§ 34*)—CONSTRUCTION.

Revisal 1905, § 495, providing that the allegations of a pleading shall be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties, means only that if it can be seen from the general scope of the pleading that the party has a cause of action or defense, though imperfectly alleged, the fact that it has not been stated with technical accuracy or precision will not be so taken against him as to deprive him of it, and will not be construed to mean that a pleading says what it does not.

3. PLEADING (§ 48*)—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER.

A complaint cannot be overthrown by a demurrer if, in any portion or to any extent, it presents facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or if facts sufficient for that purpose can be fairly gathered therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

4. PLEADING (§§ 192, 367*)—OBJECTIONABLE FEATURES—CORRECTION.

Any formal defect in a pleading which renders it unintelligible may be corrected on motion as authorized by Revisal 1905, § 496, or in cases where it contains a defective statement, as the omission of a necessary allegation which can be cured by amendment, a demurrer will lie.

5. PLEADING (§ 346*) — DEMURRER — FRIVOLOUSNESS.

A demurrer to a complaint was not frivolous so as to entitle plaintiff to judgment on the pleadings where it raised a question fit for consideration or discussion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by the New Bern Banking & Trust Company against R. N. Duffy and others. From an order overruling the demurrer of defendant D. H. Green, he appeals. Affirmed.

Simmons & Ward, for appellant. Moore & Dunn, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is an action upon a note originally made by R. N. Duffy and A. C. Burnett to D. H. Green, and by the latter indorsed for value to the plaintiff. In a former suit we directed that a judgment be entered against R. N. Duffy, and that the cause proceed against D. H. Green, for whom a new summons was issued and executed. A. C. Burnett has never been served with process, and is therefore not a party to the suit, so as to be bound by any judgment therein. The facts are stated in a case by the same title (153 N. C. 62, 68 S. E. 915).

[1] Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the following grounds: (1) That the corporate existence of the plaintiff is not alleged. It appears by allegations of the complaint that defendant D. H. Green dealt with the plaintiff as if it had lawful right to contract with him, and he indorsed the paper to plaintiff, thereby impliedly admitting that it is a corporation, as it purported to be. In Ryan v. Martin, 91 N. C. 465, Judge Merriam said: "It is true that it must appear that there was a corporate existence either de jure, or de facto at least. And, if the corporation itself were suing, it would be necessary for it to prove its charter, and an organization in accordance therewith, if these matters were properly put in issue. But if a person entered into a contract with a body purporting to be a corporation, or which claims to hold property purchased and derives title thereto from it, this is prima facie evidence against such person that such corporation was in existence de facto at least at the time of the contract with or purchase from it, and the presumption arises in such case that the existence of the corporation continues at the bringing of the action. Accordingly it has been held in an action against the maker of a promissory note executed to a corporation as payee, in its corporate name, that the production of the note duly indorsed to the plaintiff was sufficient evidence that the corporation was duly organized and competent to transact business. Williams v. Cheney, 3 Gray (Mass.) 215, 220. It was said in that case that the defendants by giving their notes to the corporation in their corporate name as payees admitted their legal existence and capacity to make and enforce the contracts declared on, so far at least as to render proof on that point unnecessary in the opening of the plaintiff's case." So in Stanly v. Railroad Co., 89 N. C. 331, it was held that a railroad company in a suit against it may be designated as a company by its corporate name, without an averment of its corporate capacity, and, if this is disputed, it should be by answer, and not by demurrer. Where the defendant's counsel insisted that a declaration describing the defendant as a company, without showing whether or not it was a corporation, was open to a demurrer, Mr. Justice Maule said: "There is no positive rule that I am aware of which requires such a mode of description as the defendant's counsel insists upon in this case, nor is the description which is given at all out of the usual form. It impliedly amounts to an allegation that the defendant is a corporate body." Wolfe v. Steamboat Company, 62 E. C. L. 103.

The note was to become due at a day certain, with a provision that if there was a default in payment of any installment of interest at its maturity, and for 10 days after a demand, plaintiff might sue upon the note before the day fixed for its maturity. Plaintiff alleged that demand had been made for the payment of interest after default, and that the same has not been paid. It is argued by the defendant's counsel that there is neither an allegation that demand was made upon this defendant, nor that, if made, 10 days had expired before this suit was commenced, so as to bring the demand within the terms and requirements of the bond. The record shows that the suit was begun on April 20, 1911, and summons served on April 24, 1911. We may look at the summons to ascertain this fact. Harrington v. Wadesboro, 153 N. C. 437, 69 S. E. 399, where a learned discussion of the subject by Justice Hoke will be found, backed by a copious citation of authorities. So that this ground of demurrer is not true in fact. That the demand was made upon this defendant, D. H. Green, sufficiently appears in the complaint. He is now the only defendant, and we cannot assume that the plaintiff made a demand upon some one who did not owe the debt, or upon a person who had not been sued. The allegation by fair construction and intentment means that it was made upon D. H. Green.

[2] We have had occasion to state the rule by which, under the Code, a pleading should be construed so as to ascertain its meaning, and it is to this effect: The uniform rule prevailing in our present system is that, for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning and determining the effect of a pleading, its allegations shall be liberally construed, with a view to substantial justice between the parties. Revisal 1905, § 495. This does not mean that a pleading shall be construed to say what it does not, but that if it can be seen from its general scope that a party has a cause of action or defense, though imperfectly alleged, the fact that it has not been stated with technical accuracy or precision will not be so taken against him as to deprive him of it. Bule v. Brown, 104 N. C. 335, 10 S. E. 435.

[3] As a corollary of this rule, therefore, it may be said that a complaint cannot be overthrown by a demurrer, unless it be wholly insufficient. If in any portion of it or to any extent it presents facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or if facts sufficient for that purpose can be fairly gathered from it, the pleading will stand, however artificially it may have been drawn, or however uncertain, defective, or redundant may be its statements, for, contrary to the common-law rule, every reasonable intendment and presumption must be made in favor of the pleader. It must be fatally defective before it will be rejected as insufficient. 4 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 74 et seq.; Stokes v. Taylor, 104 N. C. 394, 10 S. E. 566; McEachin v. Stewart, 106 N. C. 336, 11 S. E. 274; Halstead v. Mullen, 93 N. C. 252; Purcell v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 414, 12 S. E. 954, 956, 12 L. R. A. 113; Holden v. Warren, 118 N. C. 327, 24 S. E. 770. There should, of course, be at least substantial accuracy in the averments. Norton v. McDevit, 122 N. C. 755, 30 S. E. 24.

[4] It is also required that there should be not only certainty, but clearness and conciseness, and a compliance with the other essential rules in the science of pleading, which have been adopted for the purpose of evolving the real issues from the controversy; but if there is any formal defect in this respect, which renders the pleading unintelligible, or the precise nature of the charge or defense be not apparent by reason thereof, it can be corrected on motion (Revisal, § 496), or in some cases where there is a defective statement, as the omission of a necessary allegation which can be cured by amendment, a demurrer will lie. Bowling v. Burton, 101 N. C. 176, 7 S. E. 701, 2 L. R. A. 285; Mizzell v. Ruffin, 118 N. C. 69, 23 S. E. 927; Ladd v. Ladd, 121 N. C. 118, 28 S. E. 190; Blackmore v. Winders, 144 N. C. 212, 56 S. E. 874.

Tested by this rule, the complaint, while not very explicit in its statements, is sufficiently so to resist and repel the attack of a demurrer.

[5] We will not adjudge this demurrer to be frivolous, as the plaintiff alleges it to be, but it narrowly escapes such condemnation. The able and ingenious argument of the learned counsel has convinced us that it should not be so characterized, and has thus rescued it from the fate to which we have been asked to consign it. We have held that a pleading will not be adjudged frivolous, irrelevant, or impertinent, so as to entitle the other party to a judgment non obstante placito, unless it is clearly and palpably so. Hull v. Carter, 83 N. C. 249. If it raises a question, whether of law or fact, fit for consideration or discussion, we will not adjudge it to be irrelevant, and as not standing in the way of a summary judgment upon the pleadings. Womble v. Fraps, 77 N. C. 198. Even under the old system of pleading and practice, the courts hesitated to give judgment upon a pleading unless it plainly raised no real issue of law or fact, for Baron Parke, in Linwood v. Squire, 5 Exch. (W. H. & G.) 234, said: "I do not say that the plea is a good plea, as it is not necessary to decide that question, but a plaintiff has no right to sign judgment, if the plea raises a serious question, and one which is fit for discussion." The courts do not encourage the practice of moving for judgment upon an answer or demurrer as being frivolous. Womble v. Fraps, supra; Swepson v. Harvey, 66 N. C. 436; Erwin v. Lowrey, 64 N. C. 321. The more recent cases upon this subject are collected in the excellent note of Judge Pell in his annotations to section 472 of the Revisal, a reference to which will suffice, without any further remark upon the decisions. We have found it necessary in this case to discuss the question presented by the demurrer, especially as to the demand, in order to decide it.

We find no error in the ruling of the court. No error.

CROMARTIE v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

1. CONTINUANCE (§ 51*)—ABSENT WITNESSES—REFUSAL—ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

The trial court granted defendant a continuance because of the absence of a witness, and, after naming the day for trial, gave defendant permission to take the deposition of the witness. Defendant failed to take this deposition, thinking that the witness would be present in person. Two days before the day of trial defendant found that the witness would be too ill to appear, and, upon plaintiff's refusal to consent to the taking of a deposition, took an unsworn statement. Held, that a refusal to grant another continuance was not an abuse of discretion, particularly where the unsworn statement was read in evidence.

2. CONTINUANCE (§ 7*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 966*)—DISCRETION.

The granting of a motion for continuance rests in the sound discretion of the trial judge, whose ruling is not reviewable save where there has been an abuse of discretion.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 278, 281*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by an injured brakeman, evidence held to support the findings that he was injured by the negligence of the master, and that, notwithstanding any negligence on his part, the master by the exercise of reasonable care might have avoided the injury.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 243*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—RULES.

Where the rules for the employees of a railroad company were habitually disregarded, superiors directing inferiors to pursue other methods, a breach of a rule will not bar an employee's right to recover for an injury.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURY TO SERVANT.

Where an engineer knew that a brakeman was, in the exercise of his duties, riding upon the opposite side of the pilot, it was his duty to keep a careful lookout so as to protect him from possible injuries, and, as he could not see him from the throttle window, his failure to immediately stop the engine upon hearing screams and unusual noises was negligence, for which the master is liable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by A. A. Cromartie against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action to recover damages for personal injury.

These issues were submitted:

"(1) Was plaintiff injured by the negligence of defendant company as alleged?" Answer: "Yes."

"(2) Did the plaintiff by his own negligence contribute to his injury?" Answer: "No."

"(3) Notwithstanding plaintiff's negligence, could the defendant company by the exercise of reasonable care have avoided said injury?" Answer: "Yes."

"(4) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover?" Answer: "$6,300."

From the judgment the defendant appealed.

Harry Skinner, for appellant. Ward & Grimes and Julius Brown, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The defendant excepts to the refusal of the court to continue the case on account of the absence of two of the defendant's witnesses, claiming that the refusal in this instance amounts to a gross abuse of discretion.

[1] The facts stated in the record acquit his honor of any abuse of the discretion vested in him. They are as follows: On May 1, 1911, when this case was called for trial, defendant stated that it could not go to trial. The reason assigned was that at the former term this case was continued by consent, owing to the fact that a witness under subpoena for the defendant company (W. D. Medley, engineer) was then sick. The court, after hearing affidavits and telegrams connected with Engineer Medley's condition, stated that it would continue the case, but that it would fix Monday, May 1st, peremptorily for the case to be called for trial and in the meantime gave permission that depositions necessary should be taken. On the day before the day appointed for taking the deposition, attorney for defendant received telegrams that Medley was then up and out, and that his physicians stated that he would be able to attend court on Monday, May 1st. Under these conditions and circumstances, with the consent of plaintiff's counsel, the taking of the deposition was called off. On Saturday, the 29th of April, attorney for defendant received telegrams saying that Medley had had a relapse, and would not be able to attend court at Greenville on May 1st. On receipt of these telegrams, counsel for defendant informed counsel for plaintiff of their contents, and notified them that, although it was irregular, they would take the deposition of W. D. Medley, engineer, on the night of the 29th of April, at Rocky Mount, unless they would agree to continue the case. Counsel for plaintiff refused either to continue the case or to take the deposition. Therefore counsel for defendant notified counsel for plaintiff that he would take a statement from Engineer Medley on Saturday night, the 29th of April, and would use it as a basis for continuance on the calling of the case on May 1st; and, on this being refused, would ask that the statements contained therein be admitted in evidence on affidavit. When the case was called on Monday, May 1st, these statements were made in open court, and not disputed. The court held, that it would not continue the case as defendant should have taken the deposition in regular order, but would permit the written statement made by Medley to be read to the jury as the testimony of Medley as if he were present. In this there is nothing indicating any abuse of discretion. The defendant had opportunity to take the depositions, but failed to do so. Nevertheless Medley's ex parte statement was read to the jury, and is set out in the record. We think his honor was very liberal in his treatment of the defendant under the circumstances.

[2] It is well settled that a motion for continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the presiding judge. The exercise of such discretion is not reviewable, except in a case where it is grossly abused. Lanier v. Insurance Co., 142 N. C. 15, 54 S. E. 786.

[3] A motion to nonsuit was made, overruled, and exception duly taken, and is the first assignment of error discussed at length in the brief of the learned counsel for defendant. The plaintiff's evidence tended to prove that plaintiff was a brakeman on defendant's train. On April 5, 1909, he was on duty on a freight running from Rocky Mount to Florence. His duties were opening and closing switches, and shunting off cars. The train on this day went into the yards at Florence about 5:40 o'clock p. m. These yards contained many switches. As the train approached the yards, plaintiff got upon the pilot to open the main line switch, and rode on it into the yards. There were four or five switches to open and close. After throwing a switch, the train continued to run on. The next switch, 50 or 100 yards away, was on the opposite side of the train to that of the one last thrown. Plaintiff crossed over the pilot in front to get over to the other side to throw the switch. He got safely over, and was standing in the foothold made for the purpose of standing in it, on the front and bottom of the pilot, nine inches wide and four or five inches high, holding by his hands to a rod of iron, which crosses the pilot at the top, his back to the front, and looking toward the cab windows of the engineman and fireman, to give signals by hand waving. While so standing, the pilot plowed through a pile of cinders or something piled on the track. The pilot is V-shape. The substance on the track knocked plaintiff's foot off the foothold upon the track between the rails. As he fell, plaintiff threw his weight upon the iron rod. This gave way, plaintiff slipping by his weight towards the side of the pilot five or six inches. Plaintiff held on to the lift lever, his heel on ground between rails. The beam of the pilot pressing on his instep pushed plaintiff's heel across the ties, and on the track backwards. Plaintiff testifies that he held firmly to lift lever unable to extricate his foot dragging on rail; that all the time he was screaming for help as loud as possible, and looking at fireman's window; that the fireman was not in his window, and the engineer was at the throttle. Plaintiff testifies that he knew there was a switch and frog just ahead, and that it would hold his foot, break his hold, and pull him backwards before the moving train. He held on for some 40 yards, and then turned loose and fell, and the wheels crushed his foot and ankle. Plaintiff testifies that at speed engine was going it could have been stopped "almost instantly." Plaintiff had been riding on the pilot in this way to throw switches during his entire employment, nearly three years. The trainmasters, conductors, and engineers had known of his riding there, and had directed him to do it. The conductor of that particular train had ridden by his side on same pilot going into the same yards. The engineer, Medley, testifies that he knew that plaintiff was on the pilot for the purpose of changing switches, and, further, that he heard the hollowing, but thought it was a woman laughing, but he did not stop his engine. We will not discuss the many assignments of error presented in the record, and discussed in the brief.

In our view there is sufficient evidence to support the findings of the jury upon the first and third issues, which renders it unnecessary to consider the defense of contributory negligence so earnestly discussed by counsel.

[4] The evidence shows that it was a very common custom for brakemen to ride on the pilots of engines in order more expeditiously to change switches in the defendant's yards. In this case the evidence is abundant that plaintiff had done so constantly for years with the knowledge and by direction of his superiors. But, assuming for argument's sake that he had violated a rule of the company, that does not necessarily bar recovery. Thomas v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 392, 40 S. E. 201; Biles v. Railroad, 139 N. C. 528, 52 S. E. 129. The plaintiff was actually on the pilot with the knowledge of the engineer and conductor for the purpose of opening switches.

[5] Under such conditions, it was the peculiar duty of the engineer to keep a careful lookout for the brakeman so as to protect him from injury if possible. He knew the brakeman was on the opposite side of pilot, and he could not see him from the window at the throttle. He heard the hollowing or screaming of plaintiff, but thought it was a "woman laughing." There is no evidence that there was a woman anywhere in the neighborhood. Knowing plaintiff's dangerous position and hearing the unusual and extraordinary sounds in front of his engine, it was the plain duty of the engineer to resolve all doubts in favor of human life and stop his engine at once. The engineer says he was running  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles per hour. There is evidence that he could have stopped almost instantly; that plaintiff was dragged 40 yards, "screaming at top of his voice all the time." This evidence is scarcely controverted, and fully justifies the conclusion that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of defendant's servant, and that such negligence was the immediate or proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to discuss other assignments of error of the defendant or other phases of the evidence of negligence presented by plaintiff's counsel. The motion for new trial on account of newly discovered evidence is denied.

No error.

HARDIN v. CITY OF RADFORD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 14, 1911.)

1. LICENSES (§ 6*)—POWERS—MUNICIPALITIES—SALE OF CIDER.

Under Radford City Charter (Laws 1910, c. 192) § 54, providing that the council may raise taxes annually on all subjects taxable by the state, and section 57 authorizing the council to levy a tax on licenses to agents of insurance companies and others and upon any other business, whether a license may be required by the state or not, the city may impose a license tax upon one in the business of selling cider, for the first section gives general powers of taxation upon all businesses not prohibited, and that the enumeration in the second section did not except that business.

2. STATUTES (§ 95*)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—LICENSES.

Radford City Charter (Laws 1910, c. 192) § 57, providing that the city council may levy a tax upon licenses to agents of insurance companies, to auctioneers, and others and any other business, whether a license may be required therefor by the state or not, is not a violation of Const. § 117, inhibiting special legislation.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 592*)—CONFLICTING REGULATIONS—SALE OF CIDER.

Act March 15, 1910 (Acts 1910, c. 190) § 14, which is part of an act defining and regulating the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors, and permitting the sale of pure apple cider, in no way prohibits cities and towns from imposing license taxes upon persons in the business of selling cider.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1311-1314; Dec. Dig. § 592.*]

5. LICENSES (§ 19*)—SALE OF CIDER—EXEMPTIONS.

Code 1904, § 1042a, prohibits any city or town from imposing any tax or penalty upon any person selling his own farm and domestic products within the limits of such city and outside of the regular market houses. Defendant was in the business of selling cider, which was not made from apples growing on his land, but was the product of an incorporated fruit farm. Held, that the exemption of the statute did not extend to case of defendant, and a license tax might be lawfully imposed upon him.

Error to Corporation Court of Radford.

Action by the City of Radford against H. T. Hardin. There was a judgment for the city imposing a fine upon defendant for conducting a business without a license, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Woods & McNulty, for plaintiff in error.
H. C. Tyler, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff in error seeks to set aside a judgment imposing upon him a fine of $10 for conducting the business of selling cider without a license, in violation of an ordinance of the city of Radford.

[1] The contention that the city of Radford has no power to levy a tax upon the business of selling cider, and that, if it has, the tax imposed of $50 is unreasonable, cannot be sustained. The language of the charter (Acts 1910, p. 318, § 54) with respect to the powers of taxation thereby conferred upon the city is substantially the same as that found in the charters of other cities of the commonwealth, and has been repeatedly held to confer upon the city council general powers of taxation, including all persons and subjects of taxation, except only as they may be limited by the laws of the state or of the United States. The business of selling cider is not exempt from taxation because it is not mentioned among the subjects of taxation enumerated in section 57 of the charter. It is clear that the Legislature did not undertake to enumerate all the subjects and classes upon which a license tax might be imposed. On the contrary, it followed the few subjects enumerated with the broad language, "and any other business, whether a license may be required therefor by the state or not," thereby plainly indicating that there were other pursuits not named that might be licensed. N. N. & O. P. Ry. & C. Co. v. City of Newport News, 100 Va. 157, 40 S. E. 645.

[2] There is no merit in the contention that section 57 of the charter is void because it is in violation of section 117 of the Constitution (Code 1904, p. cxxxviii), inhibiting special legislation.

[3] As to the contention that the tax of $50 imposed upon the business of selling cider is unreasonable, it is enough to say that the power of taxation rests with the legislative, and not with the judicial, department of the government, and its province cannot be invaded by the courts. Woodall v. City of Lynchburg, 100 Va. 318, 40 S. E. 915.

[4] It is further contended that section 14 of an act approved March 12, 1908 (Acts 1908, c. 189), as amended by an act approved March 15, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 289), permits the sale of cider which is the pure juice of the apple.

This is an act defining and regulating the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors and malt beverages and imposing license taxes thereon. In what way it prohibits the cities and towns of the commonwealth from imposing a license tax upon persons engaged in the regular business of selling cider, such as the plaintiff in error is shown to be conducting, has not been pointed out, and we are unable to see that the statute invoked in any way bears upon or affects the issue involved in this case.

[5] In resisting the fine imposed, the chief reliance of the plaintiff in error seems to rest upon the contention that, under section 1042a of the Code of 1904, the business of selling cider within the limits of a city is exempt from taxation, because it is a farm or domestic product.

The record shows that during the month of May, 1910, the plaintiff in error was occupying a regular place of business upon the principal business street of Radford, conducting daily without a license the business of selling cider, which was not made from apples grown on his own land, but was the product of apples grown or bought by the Rose Cliff Fruit Farm, Incorporated, at Waynesboro, Va.

Section 1042a of the Code has no application to this case. That section of the statute law, as its language clearly shows, was intended to prohibit the several cities and towns of the commonwealth from imposing and collecting any tax, fine, or other penalty upon and from persons selling farm and domestic products of their own production within the limits of such town or city. In other words, persons are thereby permitted to bring their own farm and domestic products to the towns and cities and sell the same upon the streets and outside of the regular market houses and sheds without paying a curbage license tax for the privilege. The plaintiff in error does not claim to own a foot of land or to produce himself an article of farm or domestic production. On the contrary, he admits that he is conducting the business of selling cider made by the Rose Cliff Fruit Farm of Waynesboro, Va. If the interpretation sought to be placed upon section 1042a by the plaintiff in error were possible, many businesses not contemplated by the statute could be regularly conducted in the towns and cities without paying a tax for the privilege.

[6] The plaintiff in error further contends that the fine was improperly imposed upon him because he was conducting the business, not for himself, but as agent of the Rose Cliff Fruit Farm, Incorporated.

The plaintiff in error cannot escape liability by showing that he was acting as agent for the Rose Cliff Fruit Farm, Incorporated. He was personally conducting a regular place of business without the required license, and for this he was fined. The city had no means of knowing that he was acting for the Rose Cliff Fruit Farm, a wholesale manufacturer of cider at Waynesboro, Va.

A person who transacts business without a license, where a license is required, is not relieved from the consequences by showing that he acted as agent for another. O'Donnell v. Commonwealth, 108 Va. 882, 62 S. E. 373; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. p. 1133, note, and cases cited.

There is no error in the judgment complained of, and it is affirmed.

Affirmed.

ADAMS EXPRESS CO. v. GREEN.

1. CARRIERS (§ 158*)—EXPRESS COMPANY—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—STATUTES.

Under Code 1904, § 1294c, subsec. 24, declaring that any carrier issuing its receipt shall be liable for loss or damage from its own negligence or the negligence of any connecting carrier, and that no receipt shall exempt it from the liability of a common carrier, the provision of an express company's receipt limiting its liability to a certain sum, unless a greater value was declared by the shipper, would furnish no defense to the shipper's action to recover the value of goods lost or injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 708, 709; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 148*)—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

Where the limitation of liability in the receipt of a common carrier is not contrary to a fixed public policy, the general rule in cases involving a conflict of laws in respect to contracts for carriage is that the carrier's liability is governed by the lex loci contractus, and not by the lex fori.

3. CARRIERS (§ 148*)—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS—PUBLIC POLICY.

The provision of an express company's receipt, issued in the state of New York, on a shipment of goods to this state, that, in consideration of the rate charged, which was based upon a value not exceeding $50, unless a greater value was declared, the shipper agreed that the value of the goods was not more than that sum, and that the company would not be liable in any event for more than that sum, though valid in New York, is contrary to the public policy of this state, as declared by Code 1904, § 1294c, subsec. 24, which makes a common carrier liable for any loss or injury to goods caused by its neglect or that of a connecting carrier, and provides that no receipt shall exempt any common carrier from the liability which would exist in the absence of contract, and hence furnishes no defense to an action in this state to recover the full value of the goods upon loss or injury.

4. CARRIERS (§ 110*)—LOSS OR INJURY TO GOODS—SHIPPER'S MISREPRESENTATION OF VALUE—DEFENSE.

Where a shipper misrepresents the character of a package for shipment, or misleads the carrier as to its value, he can, in case of loss, recover only its apparent value according to the representations made; and this is especially true where the representation was made in order to obtain a lower rate.

5. CARRIERS (§ 110*)—LOSS OR INJURY TO GOODS—DEFENSES—CONTRACTS IN VIOLATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

While the interstate commerce act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, § 10, par. 3, 24 Stat. 382, as added by Act March 2, 1889, c. 382, § 2, 25 Stat. 858 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3160]) prohibits a shipper from obtaining the transportation of property at less than the regular rates then established and in force, by fraudulent representations as to value, and makes such fraud a misdemeanor and imposes a penalty therefor, it does not prevent the shipper, on loss of the goods, from recovering their apparent value according to the fraudulent representations made, since, as the carrier's charges were based on that value, it is fair and just that it should be held liable for their loss upon the same basis of value.

6. CARRIERS (§ 110*)—KNOWLEDGE OR CONCEALMENT BY SHIPPER—NEGLECT TO STATE VALUE—DEFENSE.

That an express company accorded shipments of the value of $50 and over a higher degree of care than shipments under that value, that, had it known the value of the shipment involved, it would have accorded it the unusual and extraordinary care that shipments of its value were accorded, that the shipper had knowledge that valuable shipments were handled with more care than shipments of ordinary value, and that the contract prepared by the company had a blank space containing the word "value," as a request to the shipper to value the shipment, and that by his failure to do so it was not informed of its value and was deprived of the opportunity of giving the shipment unusual care, do not amount to a case of fraudulent representation or concealment of the value of the shipment, and afford no defense to an action to recover its full value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 497-500, 503, 504; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Roanoke.

Action by Mrs. K. W. Green against the Adams Express Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Woods, Jackson & Smith and Cox & Cocke, for plaintiff in error. Moomaw & Moomaw and D. Saylor Good, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This action was brought by the defendant in error to recover damages from the plaintiff in error for the loss of a package of jewelry, delivered to the latter in the state of New York, to be carried to the former at Roanoke, in the state of Virginia. The express company filed the plea of not guilty and offered five special pleas, which were objected to by the plaintiff and rejected by the court. The plea of the general issue was afterwards withdrawn, and upon proof of the value of the package of jewelry lost there was a judgment against the express company for $412.70. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The ground of defense relied on in rejected special pleas Nos. 1 and 2 was that by the contract for shipment entered into when the package was received it was provided that, "In consideration of the rate charged for said property, which is regulated by the value thereof and is based upon the valuation of not exceeding fifty dollars unless a greater value is declared, the shipper agrees that the value of said property is not more than fifty dollars unless a greater value is stated herein, and that the company shall not be liable in any event for more than fifty dollars if no value is stated herein," and that such a contract limiting the liability of the express company, being valid in the state of New York where it was made, is valid in this state, and that since the value of the package was not stated in the contract there could be no greater recovery than $50, notwithstanding subsection 24 of section 1294c, of Pollard's Code.

That subsection contains the following provision: "Whenever any property is received by a common carrier to be transferred from one place to another, within or without this state, or when a railroad or other transportation company issues its receipt or bills of lading in this state, the common carrier, railroad or transportation company issuing such bill of lading shall be liable for any loss or damage or injury to such property caused by its negligence or the negligence of any common carrier, railroad or transportation company operating within any territory or state of the United States to which such property may be delivered, or over whose lines such property may pass; and the fact of loss or damage in such case shall itself be prima facie evidence of negligence, and the common carrier, railroad or transportation company issuing such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover in a proper action the amount of any loss, damage, or injury it may be required to pay to the owner of such property from the common carrier, railroad or transportation company aforesaid through whose negligence the loss, damage, or injury may be sustained. No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any such common carrier, railroad or transportation company from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract been made or entered into."

[1] If the contract for shipment had been entered into in this state, there can be no question that under the decisions of the court in Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Beasley, Couch & Co., 104 Va. 788, 52 S. E. 566, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, Same v. Pew, 109 Va. 288, 64 S. E. 35, and Southern Ry. Co. v. Keeler, 109 Va. 459, 64 S. E. 38, the provision limiting the liability of the express company would have furnished no defense to the right of the plaintiff to recover the full value of the property lost. The question, therefore, which we are called upon to determine is whether the law of the state of New York or the law of this state should govern in determining the liability of the express company.

[2] The general rule seems to be that in cases involving a conflict of laws in respect to contracts of affreightment, the carrier's liability is governed by the lex loci contractus, and not by the lex fori. Minor's Conflict of Laws, § 169; 1 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) §§ 212 and 206; 6 Cyc. 411, 412, and cases cited. But a different rule prevails in the Supreme Court of the United States and in some of the state courts, where the limitation in the bill of lading is contrary to the fixed public policy of the United States or of the particular state. 1 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 214.

In the recent case of The Kensington, 183 U. S. 263, 22 Sup. Ct. 102, 46 L. Ed. 190, the contention was in effect, as stated by Mr. Justice White (now Chief Justice), that, "where a contract limiting the liability of a carrier against its own negligence is made in a foreign country, to be executed at least in part in the United States, the law of the foreign country, either by its own force or by virtue of the agreement of the contracting parties, must be enforced by the courts of the United States, even though to do so requires the violation of the public policy of the United States." In replying to that contention, the learned Justice said: "To state the proposition is to answer it. It is true as a general rule that the lex loci governs, and it is also true that the intention of the parties to a contract will be sought out and enforced. But both these elementary principles are subordinate to and qualified by the doctrine that neither by comity nor by the will of contracting parties can the public policy of a country be set at naught. * * * Nor is the suggestion that because there is no statute expressly prohibiting such contracts, and it is assumed no offense against morality is committed in making them, therefore they should be enforced despite the settled rule of public policy to the contrary. The existence of the rule of public policy, and not the ultimate causes upon which it may depend, is the criterion."

[3] While the precise question involved in the case under consideration has never been passed upon by this court, the conclusion was reached, in the case of National Car Co. v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co., 110 Va. 413, 66 S. E. 88, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1010, that a contract with a common carrier, made in another state, valid there, but to be partly performed in this state, would not be enforced by its courts when in violation of the public policy of this state, as shown by its statutes. In that case the contract whose validity was involved was made in the state of Kentucky, by which the common carrier gave to one person the exclusive right to place advertisements on its box cars; a part of its line of road being in this state. That contract, whether valid or invalid in the state of Kentucky, where made, it was held, would not be enforced in the courts of this state, because it gave to one person an undue and unreasonable preference and advantage over others, in violation of the public policy of this state, as shown by subsection 3, § 1294c, Va. Code 1904.

The principle involved in that case and the one under consideration seem to be substantially the same. Both were contracts made in another state, and valid, or conceded to be valid, where made. The provisions of both were to be executed or performed in part in this state. The provisions in each were in violation of the public policy of this state, as shown by its statutes.

The decisions in the Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Beasley, Couch, etc., supra, and the cases which follow it, are based upon the view that a contract with a common carrier, limiting its liability to a sum less than the actual value of the article shipped, in consideration of a reduced rate, was in effect exempting the carrier, pro tanto, from its own negligence or misconduct. It is clearly as much against the fixed policy of this state to permit a common carrier to exempt itself from liability for its own negligence, as it is to allow it to give one person an undue and unreasonable preference and advantage over others.

The court is of opinion that the trial court properly rejected special pleas numbered 1 and 2.

Pleas numbered 3 and 4 aver a state of facts which, if true, show that the consignors of the package of jewelry knew that the value of the goods shipped regulated the rate of charges for carriage, and that they fraudulently, by their acts and conduct, represented that the package of jewelry delivered to the defendant company for shipment did not exceed the value of $50, and thereby obtained a lower rate of charge, when in fact they knew that the jewelry was worth $412.50, the amount now sought to be recovered as damages for its loss.

Although the courts of this state will not enforce a contract like that relied on in special pleas numbered 1 and 2, because it is in violation of the public policy of the state as declared by statute, yet, if the shipper through fraudulent representations, verbal or otherwise, conceals the true value of the article shipped, there is no reason why he should not, as in other cases, suffer the consequences of his own fraud.

[4] It seems to be established in England and in this country by the weight of authority, and by the better reason, that where the shipper misrepresents the character of a package for shipment, or misleads the carrier as to its value, he can in case of loss only recover its apparent value according to the representations made; and especially is this true where the representation was made in order to obtain a lower rate of charges. See 1 Hutchinson on Carriers, §§ 328-332; 6 Cyc. 380; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 345;

note to Bottum v. Charleston, etc., Ry. Co., 5 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 118, 120-122, where a large number of cases, English and American, are cited.

Such a rule is fair and just to both parties. It would be not only unreasonable, but wrong, for a shipper by his fraudulent representations to have his goods carried for a compensation based upon a valuation much less than their actual value, and then in case of loss to recover their full value from the carrier. To so hold would permit the shipper to take advantage of his own wrong.

[8] The trial court, we think, erred in rejecting special plea numbered 4, but properly rejected special plea numbered 3, because that plea denied the plaintiff's right to recover anything. While paragraph 3, § 10, of the interstate commerce act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 382, as added by Act March 2, 1889, c. 382, § 2, 25 Stat. 858, 3 Fed. St. Ann. 835 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3160]), relied on in that plea, prohibits a shipper from obtaining the transportation of property at less than the regular rates then established and in force by fraudulent representations as to the value, and makes such fraud a misdemeanor and imposes a penalty therefor, it ought not, we think, to prevent the shipper from recovering, if the goods are lost, their apparent value according to the fraudulent representations made. The carrier's charges were based upon that value, and, if the goods were lost by a failure of duty on its part, it is reasonable and just that it should be held liable for their loss upon the same basis of value.

[8] Special plea No. 5, as construed by the defendant company in its petition for this writ of error, sets up in substance the following facts:

"(1) That the express company accorded shipments of the value of fifty dollars and over a higher degree of care than was accorded shipments of the value of under fifty dollars; that it accorded shipments of the value of fifty dollars and over unusual and extraordinary care, whereas it accorded shipments under the value of fifty dollars due care only.

"(2) That, had the carrier known the value of the shipment in question, it would have accorded it the unusual and extraordinary care that shipments of its value are accorded, and it would have been handled in a very different manner from the average run of shipments.

"(3) That, by reason of the shipper's failure to state the value in the contract prepared by the shipper, the carrier was not informed as to the nature and value of the shipment, and was deprived of the opportunity of giving it the unusual and extraordinary care that it would have given.

"(4) That the shipper had been in the habit of filling out the shipping contracts himself, and, being an extensive shipper over the express company, had knowledge of the fact that valuable shipments were handled with more care than shipments of ordinary value. That, in addition to this, the said shipping contract referred to contained in it a blank space above which was written the word 'value.' That this blank space left for the value was not only a request on the part of the defendant to the shipper to insert the value, in order that it might charge a rate commensurate with the risk that it was taking, but was a request for information, in order that it might give the package the care that a shipment of its value would have been given. That, therefore, no recovery over and above fifty dollars should be allowed, for the reason that the carrier was deprived of the opportunity of giving the shipment the care that a package of greater value than fifty dollars would have been given."

The facts averred do not, in our opinion, make out a case of fraudulent representation or concealment of the value of the goods on the part of the shipper, or a refusal on his part to give their value when requested. Mere knowledge on the part of the shipper of the different degrees of care which the carrier is in the habit of exercising according to the value of the goods intrusted to it for transportation cannot change the degree of care imposed upon it by law, or place upon the shipper any higher duty than if he was ignorant of such habit or custom. It would be a dangerous doctrine to hold that the degree of care required of a common carrier was to be measured by the value of the goods shipped. We do not think that such a rule has been or ought to be established.

The court is of opinion that the trial court erred in rejecting special plea No. 4, and for that error its judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.

Action by Joseph Graham, Sheriff of Pulaski County, and as such administrator de bonis non of the estate of William T. Jordan, against A. B. Hall. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed in part.

John S. Draper, for appellant. J. C. Wyssor, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This suit was instituted by the appellee, as the personal representative of William T. Jordan, to recover money paid by the latter to the appellant through a mistake of fact, as is alleged.

In the year 1884 the appellant conveyed to the said Jordan a tract of land for the sum of $4,500, which by survey made at the time was calculated to contain 90 acres, and was so described in the deed, which was with covenants of general warranty. Jordan permitted his daughter, Mrs. Mary H. Laughon, and her husband, to move upon the land in the year 1886, with the understanding that he (Jordan) intended to give it to his said daughter. Jordan died in the year 1890, leaving a will by which he gave his widow the land during her life, or as long as she remained unmarried, with remainder to his said daughter upon the expiration of his widow's estate therein. The latter did not marry again, and died in the year 1907. In the year 1908 it was ascertained by calculation made from the courses and distances named in the deed from Hall to Jordan that there were 83½ acres of land in the tract, instead of 90 acres, as described in the deed. By subsequent survey made in the same year (1908), it was ascertained that there were only 88 acres of land in the tract, or a shortage of 7 acres.

Upon the hearing of the cause, the circuit court granted the relief prayed for, and entered a decree in favor of the complainant for the sum of $350, with interest thereon from March 10, 1884, the date of Hall's deed to Jordan, until paid. From that decree this appeal was granted.

The objections made here to the decree are:

(1) That there is no clear proof that the sale was by the acre; or, if it was, that there is any deficiency in the land.

(2) That the presumption is that the claim asserted was abandoned or settled, and there is no evidence to rebut that presumption.

(3) That the claim was barred by the statute of limitations.

(4) That the claim is stale, and cannot be allowed without great risk of injustice to the appellant.

(5) That, if the trial court did not err in sustaining the claim, it erred in giving interest thereon until demand made, which was not until this suit was instituted.

[1] It satisfactorily appears, we think, that the tract of land described in the deed as containing 90 acres only contained 83 acres. It further appears that the sale was by the acre, and not in gross; for every sale of land where the quantity is referred to in the contract is presumed to be a sale by the acre, unless the language of the contract plainly indicates a sale in gross, and this presumption can only be overcome by clear and cogent proof. Hull v. Watts' Adm'r, 95 Va. 10, 27 S. E. 829; Epes v. Saunders, 109 Va. 99, 100, 63 S. E. 428, 132 Am. St. Rep. 904, and cases cited.

There is nothing in the deed, which is the only evidence of the contract of sale, nor in the oral evidence, which rebuts that presumption. On the contrary, that presumption is strengthened by the language of the deed, and by the fact that a survey of the land was made when Jordan purchased from Hall.

[2] It further satisfactorily appears, we think, that the deficiency in the quantity of the land was unknown until the year 1907 or 1908, when Mrs. Laughon and her husband were about to sell it. There is nothing to show that either the vendor or the vendee, or those who claimed under them, were at fault in not discovering the deficiency earlier. The land was surveyed by the county surveyor at the time of Hall's sale to Jordan, and had remained in the possession of the latter, his widow, and daughter from that time until the latter had sold or was about to make sale of it, and the survey was no doubt regarded by all as a correct survey. Indeed, the lines and corners were properly located by the county surveyor; but his mistake was in calculating the area in the survey. Neither a vendor nor a vendee can be regarded as at fault in not having a new survey or a new calculation of the quantity of the land made under the circumstances disclosed by the record. The mistake was mutual, and made without the fault of either vendor or vendee.

[3] The court is further of opinion that there has been no such laches in the prosecution of the appellee's claim as should deprive him of the right to recover. No lapse of time, no delay in bringing suit, however long, will defeat the remedy in cases of fraud or mutual mistake, provided the injured party during all the interval was ignorant of the fraud or mistake without fault on his part. The duty of a party to commence proceedings to assert his rights can only arise upon the discovery of the fraud or mistake, and the possible effect of laches will begin to operate only from that time. Crauford v. Smith, 93 Va. 623, 630, 23 S. E. 235, 25 S. E. 657, and the authorities cited.

[4] Neither is the claim barred by the statute of limitations, since the suit was instituted within less than the statutory period after the discovery of the mistake. Hull v. Watts, supra, 95 Va. 10, 13, 14, 27 S. E. 829.

[5] The remaining question to be considered is from what time the sum due the appellant ought to bear interest. Generally, he who has the use of another's money must pay interest upon it from the time he receives it until he repays it, unless there is an agreement, express or implied, to the contrary. Vashon v. Barrett, 105 Va. 490, 493, 54 S. E. 705, and cases cited.

[6] Our decisions are apparently not in accord as to the time from which money should bear interest which was paid and received under a mistake of fact, in the absence of fraud or misconduct in him to whom the money was mistakenly paid. See Ross v. McLauchlan, 7 Grat. 86, 97-99; Hull v. Watts, supra, 95 Va. 15, 27 S. E. 829; Crauford v. Smith, supra, 93 Va. 631, 23 S. E. 235, 25 S. E. 657; Vashon v. Barrett, supra, 105 Va. 493, 54 S. E. 705; Lee v. Laprade, 106 Va. 594, 56 S. E. 719, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1021.

In the case of Crauford v. Smith, supra, it was held that, where money has been paid and received under such circumstances, interest will not be allowed, except from the time when the mistake was discovered and demand for repayment made. The rule announced in that case was approved and followed in the case of Lee v. Laprade, supra, 106 Va. 601, 56 S. E. 719, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1021; and in a note to the last-named case, reported in 10 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 303, 307, numerous cases are cited to sustain the doctrine of the principal case. See, also, 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 1011; 22 Cyc. 1506, 1507.

The court is of opinion that the rule as to interest paid under a mutual mistake of fact, where no fraud or improper conduct can be imputed to the party receiving the same, laid down in Crauford v. Smith, and reiterated in Lee v. Laprade, is the better rule, is sustained by courts of the highest respectability, and should be adhered to.

It follows, from what has been said, that the court is of opinion that there is no error in the decree appealed from, except as to the interest allowed on the sum decreed to be paid. The decree of the circuit court must therefore be affirmed, in so far as it ascertains the principal sum which the appellee is entitled to recover, and reversed in so far as it decrees that said sum shall bear interest from the date of the deed from Hall to Jordan, instead of from the time the writ or summons commencing this suit was issued, there having been no previous demand made for the repayment of such principal. But, as the record does not show the date when said summons was issued, the cause will be remanded, with direction to the circuit court to decree interest on said principal sum from the date of the issuing of the summons. As the party substantially prevailing here, the appellant will be decreed his costs in this court.

WRIGHT v. COMMONWEALTH.

LICENSES (§ 40*)—OFFENSES AGAINST LICENSE LAWS.

Act March 11, 1906 (Acts 1906, c. 156) § 1, provided that no person should engage in the business of making loans on wages or salaries or on conditional sales of furniture, etc., without first obtaining a license therefor and fixed a penalty for its violation. Defendant, before the enactment of the statute, had made loans to certain railroad employees and taken an assignment of their wages as security; the dates of such assignments being left blank and defendant empowered to fill in the dates. Some of these loans were due and unsettled when the act became operative, and thereafter several of such claims were filed by defendant with the railway employer for collection. Held, that the statute had no retroactive effect, and that for the defendant to date and collect these pre-existing loans after the statute went into effect was no violation of it.

Error to Corporation Court of City of Roanoke.

Roscoe J. Wright was convicted for loaning money on security without a license, and he brings error. Reversed.

A. B. Hunt, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

HARRISON, J. By an act of the General Assembly approved March 12, 1906, it is provided "that no person, firm or corporation shall engage generally, regularly or collaterally to any other business, in the business of making loans on household or kitchen furniture, or household goods, or wearing apparel, or sewing machines, or musical instruments, or wages, or salaries or on conditional sales of the same without first obtaining a license therefor, which shall be in addition to the license required by law for any other business the person, firm or corporation may engage in. * * * Any person, firm or corporation violating the provisions of this section shall pay a fine of not less than fifty dollars and not more than five hundred dollars for each offense." Acts 1906, p. 242.

The plaintiff in error was indicted under this statute, found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of $100. To that judgment the present writ of error was awarded.

The record shows that before the statute in question was passed the plaintiff in error was engaged in the business of a private banker, with a license therefor, but that prior to the year 1906 he closed his business as such private banker, and since that date has made no loans taking as security therefor any of the things mentioned in the indictment or in the statute under which it is found. The record further shows that during the time prior to the enactment of the statute, when the plaintiff in error was lawfully engaged in the business of a private banker, he made loans to a number of parties at work for the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, and took as security therefor assignments of their wages; the dates of these respective assignments being left blank, with power given to the plaintiff in error to fill in such dates. Some of these loans were unsettled and due to the plaintiff in error at the time the act was passed, and after the statute became operative six of such claims were filed by the accused with the Norfolk & Western Railway Company for collection.

Upon these facts the court, over the objection of the accused, instructed the jury as follows: " * * * That if they believe from the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant, Roscoe J. Wright, has since February 10, 1909, engaged in the business of loaning money and taking as security therefor orders on or assignments of wages of the person to whom the loan was made, or of any other person, they must find the defendant guilty. That the continuing to carry pre-existing loans constitutes such a loan, and that a taking of such order signed and delivered before February 10, 1909, but dated in blank, and afterwards used, or dated since February 10, 1909, is a taking of such order since February 10, 1909."

This instruction puts a construction upon the act of March 12, 1906, not contemplated or warranted by its terms and most prejudicial to the accused. The statute has no retroactive effect, and was not intended to confiscate rights of property lawfully vested in the plaintiff in error prior to its enactment. He had the same right to enforce and collect such pre-existing loans after the passage of the act as he had before its passage. The accused continued to hold the evidence of a lawful debt given him prior to the statute, because he had been unable to collect the same. He was authorized to fill in, at his pleasure, the date of these orders taken prior to 1906, and it was no violation of the statute for him to date and collect them after the statute went into effect. The statute prohibits persons from engaging in the business of making loans on wages or salaries. It was never intended to prohibit the collection of lawful loans made prior to its passage. There is no evidence that the accused was engaged in the business of making loans upon wages or salaries after March 12, 1906. On the contrary, he was merely collecting loans lawfully made prior to that date, which he had a right to do.

The statute invoked has no application to the case made by the record, and therefore the judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial not in conflict with the views herein expressed, if the commonwealth be so advised.

ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS (§ 340*) — PROPERTY CONVEYED — CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY — EVIDENCE.

In a controversy where assignees for the benefit of creditors filed a bill asking the aid of the court in their administration of the estate, a claimant, made a party defendant, asserted title to a part of the estate claimed by the assignees on the ground that the deed of conveyance to them did not include the property involved. Held, that claimant had failed to establish his claim.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Floyd County.

Bill by V. M. Sowder and others, as trustees of Winfield Scott for the benefit of his creditors, asking the aid of the circuit court of Floyd county in the administration of the trust, in which the Scott Roller Mill Company, Incorporated, a claimant, was made a party defendant. From a decree of the circuit court, the Scott Roller Mill Company appeals. Affirmed.

Scott, Buchannan & Cardwell and B. G. Howard, for appellant. C. B. & H. M. Moomaw and R. F. Tompkins, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. On the 15th day of April, 1908, Winfield Scott conveyed to V. M. Sowder, G. W. Agnew, and F. J. Agnew, trustees, all of his estate, real and personal, for the benefit of all of his creditors; the appellant company being named in the deed of assignment as one of the creditors thereby secured. The bill in this case was filed by the three trustees named in the deed, seeking the aid of the court in the administration of the trust imposed upon them.

The present controversy is over the balance of a tract of land, known as the "mill tract," containing about 20 acres. It appears that a portion of this mill tract, amount not shown by the record, was conveyed to the appellant company prior to March 23, 1908, and that by deed bearing the last-named date the balance of the tract was conveyed to that company. This last-named deed had not been recorded on the 15th day of April, 1908, when the general assignment, which embraced the land in controversy, was made and recorded.

The circuit court held that the disputed land, known as the balance of the mill tract, passed under the trust deed to the appellees, and that the Scott Roller Mill Company acquired no title thereto under its deed of March 23, 1908, because of its failure to record such deed. From that decree this appeal was taken.

It appears that by decree of July, 1908, the cause was referred to a commissioner to report the assets of Winfield Scott conveyed in the deed of trust of April 15, 1908, and his liabilities. The commissioner filed his report the following October, reporting a debt, including interest, of $1,930.14 in favor of the appellant company. This finding was excepted to by the debtor, Winfield Scott, and thereupon the cause was recommitted to the commissioner for further inquiry with respect to the debt reported in favor of the appellant. At the following April term of the court the commissioner filed his second report, in which he reported as a liability of Winfield Scott an account filed by the appellant in the following words and figures:

March 25. To amount credited W. Scott, for twenty acres and few rods of land which company failed to get because deed was not recorded before deed of trust ..... $500.00

At the instance of the appellees, the cause was again recommitted to the commissioner, because his report was incomplete, in that it did not report all the matters of account between the Roller Mill Company and W. Scott. When the cause was pending before the commissioner under this last-mentioned order, the Scott Roller Mill Company, for the first time, brought before the commissioner its unrecorded deed of March 23, 1908, from W. Scott, claiming title thereunder to the land in controversy. In support of this claim appellant sought to show that the deed from Scott had been delivered to it at a meeting of the company's stockholders in the presence of G. W. Agnew and F. J. Agnew, two of the trustees in the deed of assignment, and that the trustees, at the time of the conveyance to them, knew that the 20 acres of land in controversy had been sold and conveyed to the appellant company.

The commissioner, in his third report, filed at the October term, 1909, says with respect to this new claim of the appellant that the weight of the evidence is against the contention that the deed to appellant was delivered to it before the 15th day of April, 1908, the date of Winfield Scott's assignment. This finding of the commissioner is amply sustained by the evidence, and it is also satisfactorily shown that the trustees had no knowledge of the deed from Winfield Scott to the appellant company until after the property had been conveyed to them for the benefit of Scott's creditors.

Appellant further insists that the deed from Winfield Scott to the trustees did not convey the 20 acres of land in controversy, and in support of this position it relies upon the following language of the assignment describing the property: "One piece bought of M. Scott, executor, balance of the mill tract after deducting the amount conveyed to the Scott Roller Mill Company, lying about three miles northeast of Floyd Court House," etc.

This description of the property as the "balance of the mill tract after deducting the amount conveyed to the Scott Roller Mill Company," is in effect the same description used by the same grantor in the deed under which the appellant claims. In both deeds the land is described as the balance of the tract; the grantor having in mind, no doubt, the fact that part of the mill tract had been conveyed to the Scott Roller Mill Company some time before this controversy. There can be no question of the identity of the land conveyed by the two deeds. That they both convey the same land is shown by the undisputed evidence of Winfield Scott, the grantor in both deeds, who says: "The description of the land in the assignment fits the same land conveyed in the deed to the Scott Roller Mill Company."

Together with a large number of other creditors of Winfield Scott, the appellant company was made a party defendant to this suit. It did not, however, which would have been the proper practice, file an answer to be treated as a cross-bill, setting up its deed of March 23, 1908, and claiming title to the property. On the contrary, appellant filed an account before the commissioner, to be audited as a liability of Winfield Scott, for $500, distinctly stating on the face of the account that it was the consideration for the deed of March 23, 1908, which it had credited to W. Scott, and was entitled to recover back because it had failed to get the land by not recording its deed before the deed of trust was recorded. This was a clear disclaimer by the appellant of any ownership of the land under the deed of March, 1908, and an assertion of its right to reimbursement of the purchase price which was allowed by the commissioner. Not until some time thereafter, when the commissioner was making his third and last report involving a settlement of the accounts between W. Scott and the appellant, did the latter bring forward this deed of March 23, 1908, and claim to be, by virtue thereof, the owner of the land in controversy.

As already seen, there were no pleadings putting in issue the present belated contention of the appellant, and, without intending to approve as proper practice the method adopted for raising the question, it is sufficient to say that upon the whole case the appellant has failed to sustain the issue raised by its assertion of title to the land in controversy, and the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

Where part of the owners of timber negligently fired by a railroad company were infants and incapable of selling their interest without the aid of a court of equity, the deterioration in timber after the injury up to the time the court of equity could act was a proper item of damage.

2. RAILROADS (§ 485*)—FIRES—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In an action for the burning of timber, there was evidence that, if the timber could be got off the land in a few months after the fire, the damage would be very little, but that, if it remained several years, it would be practically worthless. Some of the owners of the land were infants, who could not dispose of their timber without the aid of a court of equity. There was no evidence showing when a disposition of the timber could be made by the court. Held, that an instruction allowing the jury to consider the deterioration, if any, during a reasonable time for marketing the timber after the fire, was not applicable to the evidence, and was misleading.

Error to Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Action by Harriet A. Hurt and others, and action by J. L. Linkous and others, against the Virginian Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs in both cases, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

H. T. Hall and G. A. Wingfield, for plaintiff in error. Longley & Jordan, for defendants in error.

BUCHANAN, J. These were actions of trespass on the case, instituted by the defendants in error to recover damages from the Virginian Railway Company for the destruction and injury of standing trees and other property resulting from fire put out, as is alleged, by the defendant railway company's negligence.

The cases were heard together, and a verdict and judgment rendered in each against the railway company, writs of error were awarded to those judgments, and the cases were heard together in this court.

The first error assigned is to the action of the court in giving instruction No. 2 offered by the plaintiffs, and in refusing to give an instruction, also numbered 2, offered by the defendant, and in giving the latter instruction as modified by the court. The instructions, as offered, were in the following words:

Plaintiffs' Instruction No. 2:

"The court instructs the jury that the measure of damages to timber actually destroyed, if they believe from the evidence any was destroyed, is a fair cash value of such timber as it was at the place on the day it was destroyed; and the court instructs the jury that the measure of damages as to injured timber, if they believe any was injured, is the difference between such value of such timber before the fire and a fair cash value after the fire, taking into consideration the deterioration, if any, arising as a natural and probable result of said fire within a reasonable time for marketing the same."

Defendant's Instruction No. 2:

"The court instructs the jury that the burden is on the plaintiffs to show, by a preponderance of testimony, the amount of the damages claimed by them.

"In estimating the damages as to the timber alleged to have been injured or destroyed by the fire, the jury should find the difference between the value of the timber where it stood before the fire and the value of the timber after the fire; in other words, the damage suffered is the difference between the fair cash value of the timber as it stood immediately before the fire and its fair cash value as it stood immediately after the fire."

Both instructions, as offered, recognized the same rule for estimating damages for "timber destroyed," viz., its value at the time it was burned. The instructions differed as to the rule to be applied in ascertaining the damages to the timber injured. The rule as contended for by the defendant was that the true measure of damages for the injured timber was the difference in its value immediately before and immediately after the fire. On the other hand, the plaintiffs claimed, and the court so held, that the measure of damages for such timber was the difference between the value of such timber before the fire and its value after the fire, taking into consideration the deterioration, if any, arising as a natural and probable result of the fire within a reasonable time for marketing the same.

[1] As a general rule, the damages for negligently injuring standing timber ought to be ascertained as of the date of the fire. See generally Woodenware Co. v. United States, 106 U. S. 432, 1 Sup. Ct. 398, 27 L. Ed. 230; Sedgwick on Damages, § 933; notes to Bailey v. C., M. & St. Paul Ry. Co., 19 L. R. A. 653; notes to Ball v. Simms Lumber Co., 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 244.

But the facts of the particular case may be such as to take it out of the general rule. Where, for instance, there is no market value for the injured timber as it stands, or the owners of it are infants and the timber cannot be disposed of promptly, then a different rule should apply.

In these cases the evidence tends to show that there was a market for the injured timber, and that it could readily have been disposed of; but, in the case of Hurt and others against the defendant, a number of the plaintiffs were infants, incapable either of selling their interest in the land or the injured timber without the aid of a court of equity. Such deterioration, if any, resulting from the fire as would naturally and probably take place during the time reasonably necessary to obtain the aid of a court of equity in making disposition of the injured timber, was a proper item to be considered in estimating the damages in that case, as clearly the defendant, and not the plaintiffs, should bear such loss.

[2, 3] There was evidence tending to show that, if the timber could have been gotten off the land in a few months after the fire, the damage to it would have been very little, but, if it had to be gotten off with a small force, it would be damaged 50 per cent. or more. One of the plaintiffs was permitted to testify, over the objection of the defendant, that situated as he was it would take him three or four years to get the injured timber off the land, and that at the end of two years much of it would be worthless. Upon such evidence, and in the absence of evidence as to the time within which a disposition of the timber could probably be made through the aid of a court of equity, how could the instructions given as to the injured timber aid the jury in coming to any just conclusion? If they estimated the damages to the injured timber at some period subsequent to the date of the fire, at what period under the evidence could they fix it—at the end of three months, when the evidence tended to show that there would be little deterioration, or at the end of two years, when the evidence tended to show that the damage would be as much as 50 per cent., or at the end of three or four years, the time which one of the plaintiffs testified it would require him to market it, and during which period much of the timber would become worthless?

The instructions given as to the injured timber were not applicable to the evidence before the jury, and could but have misled them. Besides, the evidence of one of the plaintiffs upon which those instructions were in part based, that situated as he was it would take him three or four years to get the injured timber off the land and market it, was clearly inadmissible, and the court ought to have sustained the defendant's objection to it. The question was not what he could do in removing and marketing the timber, but the most the plaintiffs could claim under their own view of the law was what would be a reasonable time within which the timber could be marketed.

We are therefore of opinion that the instructions given as to the manner of ascertaining the damages did not correctly state the law upon the evidence before the jury, and that for that error, as well as in permitting one of the plaintiffs to testify as to the time it would take him to remove and market the timber situated as he was, the judgment of the court should be reversed.

[4] It follows from what has been said that the said instructions as to the method of ascertaining the damages to the injured timber in the Linkous case were also erroneous. In that case the plaintiffs were sui juris, and the evidence shows that the timber had a market value at the time of the fire. The measure of damages in that case was the difference between the market value of the injured timber immediately before the fire and its market value immediately after the fire.

[5] The plaintiffs asked one of their witnesses the following question, which she was permitted to answer over the defendant's objection:

"Q. You were asked how you knew that the fire was communicated from the north side of the railroad to the south side. I will ask you if there was any other possible way for the fire to begin to burn from where you saw it? A. No, sir; I do not think that there was any other way."

This action of the court is assigned as error.

The court ought to have sustained the defendant's objection. The evidence sought and obtained was merely the opinion of the witness upon a subject where opinion evidence was clearly inadmissible. The action of the court, however, would furnish no sufficient ground for reversal, as the circumstances under which the question was asked and answered show that no prejudice could have resulted to the defendant therefrom.

[6] Another error assigned is to the action of the court in permitting one of the plaintiffs' witnesses to testify that it is a common occurrence that, when fire is out, sparks or coals from it will when the wind is very high blow long distances from one high point to another. That this is so is a matter of common knowledge, doubtless as well known to the jurors as to the witness. Opinion evidence is not admissible touching such matters; but, if admitted, is generally mere harmless error. Va. Iron Coal & Coke Co. v. Tomlinson's Adm'r, 104 Va. 249, 51 S. E. 362.

[7] Errors are assigned to the action of the court in permitting witnesses Stanger and Lane to testify as stated in bills of exceptions numbered 5 and 7, respectively. The object of the evidence of these witnesses was to show the direction and velocity of the wind on the day of the fire. While Stanger testified to the direction of the wind at a later period in the day than the testimony tends to show that the fire crossed from the lands on the north side of the defendant's road to the lands on the south side, and Lane testified as to the direction and the great velocity of the wind on that day when he was some twenty or thirty miles distant, the evidence tends, we think, to sustain the plaintiffs' contention as to the direction and velocity of the wind, material facts in the case, at the time the injury occurred, and was therefore admissible for what it was worth.

The remaining assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict in the case of Linkous, etc., because contrary to the evidence. As the judgment will have to be reversed and the verdict set aside for the errors hereinbefore pointed out, and the causes remanded for new trials to be had in which the evidence may be different, it will serve no good purpose to consider that assignment of error.

In each case the judgment must be reversed, the verdict in each set aside, and the causes remanded for a new trial to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

Action by Mrs. Willetta Doughty against J. H. Whealton and another, partners as Whealton & Wisherd. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

Instructions C and D, given for plaintiff, and instructions 7, 8, and 10, asked by defendant and refused, are as follows:

Instruction C: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Mrs. Willetta Doughty, by virtue of partition deed with James P. Instruction D: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Edward T. Nottingham, the grantor of Marion Scott, did not claim title to the land in question, but acknowledged the same to be in the owner of the land, at present owned by Mrs. Doughty, then they must find for the plaintiff, unless they further believe from the evidence that Marion Scott has been in open, notorious, and continuous possession thereof, claiming bona fide title thereto for more than 15 years prior to the institution of this suit."

Instruction 7: "The court instructs the jury that by statute the bounds of every man's land lying on the seaboard is extended to ordinary low-water mark, and that a drain or gut which goes bare at ordinary low water does not cut off or prevent the extension of such line, but the same is continued across and beyond such stream down to ordinary low-water mark."

Instruction 8: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the division line between the upland of the plaintiff, Willetta Doughty, and those under whom she claims, and the uplands of the defendant and those under whom he claims, is a straight line for some distance before it reaches high-water mark, then the law continues such line in the same course to low-water mark, and, if the course of such line has been changed below high-water mark, the burden is upon the plaintiff to show it, but in deciding this question the jury should consider all the evidence heard in the case."

Instruction 10: "The court instructs the jury that the opinion or supposition or verbal declaration of E. T. Nottingham, through whom defendants claim, as to where his true lines were, cannot stop those claiming under him from claiming to the true boundaries, yet the jury may consider any such declaration as evidence to show what was the true boundary of the lands of the defendants."

Otho F. Mears and Kendall & Daniel, for plaintiffs in error. Jno. E. Nottingham, Jr., and Ben T. Gunter, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. Mrs. Willetta Doughty instituted this action of ejectment against J. H. Whealton and D. N. Wisherd, partners trading as Whealton & Wisherd, and lessees of Marion Scott, to recover the possession of certain marsh land described in the declaration. Upon the trial of the cause, there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the 187½ acres of land sued for and $125 damages on account of its detention. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

It appears that Marion Scott and defendant in error are the owners of adjoining farms in Northampton county, facing to the east on what is commonly known and designated as the "Broadwater," which covers at high tide the marshes lying between the highland and the ocean, a distance of about eight miles; that under a lease from Scott, dated February 27, 1907, plaintiffs in error entered upon the marsh lying to the east of the highland belonging to their lessor for the purpose of planting and propagating oysters thereon; that through said marshes, of which the 187½ acres in dispute here is a part, more remote from the highland deep channels run, one of which is referred to in the old deeds in evidence as "the river running down the peninsula," or "the river running along the seaside," but near the highland a great number of drains, or, as locally designated, "guts," run in irregular courses through the marshes; and that plaintiffs in error's lessor, Marion Scott, claims the disputed marsh as a part of his farm by reason of his riparian rights, while defendant in error asserts title to and possession thereof, not only by reason of her riparian rights, but by adversary possession, for the statutory period, under a claim of right thereto.

Defendant in error claims title to her farm through a deed of partition made between her and her brother, James P. Fitchett, on August 27, 1891, the land partitioned being described as "containing by estimate two hundred and fifty acres (250 a.), be the same, however, more or less, and bounded on the north by the lands of the heirs of Thomas E. Brickhouse; on the east by the Atlantic Ocean; on the south by the lands of the heirs of Edward T. Nottingham, and on the west by the lands of the heirs of John Walter Williams and James L. Nottingham, respectively." And Marion Scott is the owner of the land formerly owned by the heirs of Edward T. Nottingham referred to in said partition deed. His title thereto being undisputed in this case.

[1] The boundary line between the Scott farm and that of defendant in error, marked by trees and a ditch, runs from a county road in an easterly direction until it reaches the marsh land in dispute lying in front and to the east of the farm of Scott and south of what would be a prolongation of the boundary line between the highland of his farm and that of defendant in error; and the disputed marsh land is bounded on the north by said prolonged line, on the east by the Broadwater, on the south by Magothy Bay, and on the west by that part of Scott's farm conceded to be his. Along the east boundary of Scott's highland, separating it from the marsh, is a "gut" or channel which "heads up" from Magothy Bay to or beyond the point at which the line which separates the highland of Scott and that of defendant in error reaches the "gut," and along the line separating the highlands of the two farms there is a punch-eon fence for a short distance extending to the water in the "gut," put there some years ago for the purpose, it is claimed, so to inclose the marsh land as to keep off the stock of the adjoining landowner, and to enable defendant in error to use and enjoy the marsh in question as a pasture for her own cattle. All of this marsh in dispute is covered with water at high tide, and it is not claimed that defendant in error's highland extends to the north of it, nor is there in the partition deed mentioned, or any other deed or paper writing, in evidence under which she claims, a description of boundaries by which the 187½ acres of disputed marsh could be located. If, therefore, the "gut" or channel mentioned, which "heads up" from Magothy Bay to or beyond the point at which the line dividing the highlands of Scott and the defendant in error, ebbs dry for an appreciable distance south of said division line, the marsh in dispute belongs to Scott by virtue of the statute of 1679, now section 1339, Code 1904, unless he and those under whom he claims have lost the right thereto by an adversary possession thereof for the statutory period of limitation. French v. Bankhead, 11 Grat. 160; Groner v. Foster, 94 Va. 650, 27 S. E. 493; Waverley, etc., Co. v. White, 97 Va. 176, 33 S. E. 534, 45 L. R. A. 227.

The giving by the trial court to the jury of instructions A, B, C, and D for defendant in error, and the refusal to give instructions 7, 8, 9, and 10, asked by plaintiffs in error, is assigned as error.

[2, 3] Instruction A is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Mrs. Willetta Doughty, was in actual possession of the land in controversy and claimed title thereto by virtue of deed of partition with James P. Fitchett, and the defendants in this action entered and took possession of any part of the said premises within 15 years next preceding the institution of this action, then they should find for the plaintiff, unless they should further find that the defendants are the true owners of said land or were authorized by the true owner to enter thereon, and the burden is on the defendants to prove by a clear preponderance of evidence that they are the owners or were authorized by the true owner to so enter."

[4] The instruction is not amenable to the objection that it assumes adversary possession of the disputed marsh in defendant in error claiming title thereto by virtue of her deed of partition with James P. Fitchett when plaintiffs in error entered and took possession of a part of the premises, but the instruction did erroneously divert the attention of the jury to the question of adversary possession in defendant in error under a claim of right without evidence upon which to base it. The possession of defendant in error of her highland by virtue of said partition deed could not thereby be extended so as to embrace the disputed marsh, since neither in this partition deed nor in any other paper or papers offered in evidence under which she claims is there a description of boundaries which embraces or includes the disputed marsh.

"Where the claimant of title relies upon a deed of conveyance, it is well settled, both by reason and authority, that, in order to be effective as evidence of title, it must either in terms or by reference to other designation give such description of the subject-matter intended to be conveyed as will be sufficient to identify the same with reasonable certainty." Warville on Ejectment, § 295.

The words, "what is the whole is to be determined by the limits owned or claimed," used in instruction C, would be unobjectionable in a proper case, as where a plaintiff or a defendant in an ejectment proceeding was, upon reasonable grounds, contending that the land in controversy was within the description of boundaries given in his title papers, but to say that what is the whole of the demandant's land is to be determined by the limits claimed, though those limits are outside the boundaries described in his title papers or of his actual possession, finds no sanction either in reason or authority. These words quoted from instruction C were taken doubtless from the case of Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Grat. 191, and sanctioned in many other cases where the evidence warranted it, but, as the opinion of the court in the case named shows, the possession of the apparent owner of land who holds under color of title, having possession of part, like that of the real owner, extends to the bounds of the lands embraced in his title papers, while the possession of the intruder can extend no farther than his actual occupancy.

[5] In this case it is conceded that "wild and uncultivated lands cannot be made the subject of adversary possession while they remain completely in a state of nature." A change in their condition, to some extent, is essential. City of Richmond v. Jones, 111 Va. 214, 68 S. E. 181; Harman v. Ratliff, 93 Va. 249, 24 S. E. 1023; Turpin v. Saunders, 82 Grat. 86.

In 1 Cyc. p. 900, it is said that, although there are some decisions apparently to the contrary, the weight of authority sustains the rule that the mere occasional cutting of timber on land is not alone such evidence of ownership as to amount to a possession adverse to the true owner, and "the additional circumstances that the claimant * * * pastured his hogs or cattle there occasionally, or did other similar acts, will not constitute actual possession;" and on page 992 it is said that the occasional or periodical entry upon land to cut wild grass is not an act manifesting a purpose to take possession as owner, and does not constitute actual possession. Among the decided cases cited in support of the text just quoted is the case of Lambert v. Stees, 47 Minn. 141, 49 N. W. 662, where it is held that the fact that a person cuts hay on uninclosed land, lets his cattle roam over and pasture upon it just as they pasture on adjacent uninclosed lands, and prevents people from cutting and stealing wood on the land is not sufficient to constitute adverse possession. See, also, Wheeler v. Winn, 53 Pa. 122, 91 Am. Dec. 186.

All the authorities agree that acts done upon land requisite to constitute adverse possession must be such as to indicate and serve as notice of an intention to appropriate the land itself, and not the mere products of it, to the dominion and ownership of the party entering, being acts of permanent improvement.

The case of Drake v. Curtis, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 395, is authority for the proposition that the ordinary presumptions and conclusions of law arising from possession and use can have no application in regard to open and uninclosed flats; that the constant use of such flats by one not entitled to claim or hold them as the riparian proprietor for the ordinary purposes of navigation can give no exclusive or adversary possession. In the opinion in that case by Shaw, C. J., it is said: "The rule is simple, but it is rendered complicated and difficult of application by the infinitely diversified forms which the seashore may present."

As we have seen, the marsh land in controversy in this case is not within the descriptive boundaries of defendant in error's title papers offered in evidence, and therefore, if she has title to the marsh, it must be by reason of her riparian rights under the statute law of the state, and not by reason of a prescriptive right by virtue of the statute of limitations.

In Austin v. Minor, 107 Va. 101, 57 S. E. 609, the property in dispute was a marsh, valuable only for hunting, fishing, and trapping, and to a limited extent as a range for hogs, one of the questions presented for decision being whether the property was capable of such enjoyment as accompanied by a claim or color of title would ultimately ripen into a good title; and the opinion by Keith, P., says that, if the tide ebbs and flows over this property, it is doubtful whether a title by adverse possession can be acquired to it, separate and distinct from the rights of the riparian owner. Roe v. Strong, 107 N. Y. 350, 14 N. E. 294.

[6] The evidence in this case as to adversary possession in the defendant in error of the disputed marsh is to the effect only that her cattle and those of her predecessors in title had from time to time during many years roamed over the marsh when not covered with water at high tide, just as they roamed over other marsh lands adjoining, and that she and her predecessors in title had cut wild grass therefrom (how many times and at what intervals are not stated), and hauled it away for use as manure on the highland. This evidence did not call for or warrant the giving of instruction A with respect to the question of adversary possession, and therefore such an instruction had the tendency to divert the attention of, if not to mislead, the jury as to the true question for their consideration.

For the reasons already stated, instruction C, given for the defendant in error, was also erroneous, and should not have been given.

[7] Instruction D in the form in which it was offered should have been refused. The fact that Edward T. Nottingham, the grantor of Marion Scott, did not claim title to the land in question, but in fact acknowledged that he was not the owner of it, and disclaimed title thereto, was competent evidence to be considered by the jury along with the other evidence in determining who was the true owner, and was properly admitted for the consideration of the jury; and we think that instruction 10, asked for by the plaintiffs in error and refused by the court, should have been given, and that it sufficiently presents the law upon this aspect of the case. Sutherland v. Emswiler, 111 Va. 507, 69 S. E. 363.

[8] The crucial question in the case is whether or not the "gut," drain, or channel which "heads up" from Magothy Bay to or beyond the line which divides the highlands of defendant in error and plaintiffs in error's lessor ebbs dry at ordinary low water for an appreciable distance from said line, and, if the jury's finding from the evidence be that said "gut," drain, or channel does so ebb dry, the law of the case is as propounded in plaintiffs in error's instructions 7 and 8, which were erroneously refused. Groner v. Foster, supra; Waverley, etc., Co. v. White, supra.

As the judgment of the circuit court has to be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion, we deem it unnecessary to consider the other questions presented in the petition for this writ of error.

CAROLINA, C. & O. RY. v. CLINCH VALLEY LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 14, 1911.)

1. PLEADING (§ 383*)—GENERAL ISSUE—SPECIFICATION OF DEFENSE—EFFECT.

Where, with a plea of non assumpsit, defendant filed a specification of defense required by Code 1904, § 3249, the issue must be confined to the defense specified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1295; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 13*)—CHARGES—RATES OF FREIGHT.

Under the direct provisions of Code 1904, § 1294c, cl. 7, it is unlawful, after the freight rate of a railroad company has been authorized and published by the State Corporation Commission, for any person, by contract or other device, to obtain transportation at a less rate, and any contract for such reduced transportation is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-24; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 12*)—CHARGES—LEASES—REGISTRATION.

While Code 1904, § 1294d, cl. 56, requires every one operating a railroad under a contract or lease to file the same in the office of the State Corporation Commission, the object is only to furnish the commission with information of the lease and its contents; and if the commission treats the filing of a verified copy as a sufficient compliance with the statute, a freight rate established in favor of the lessee should not be declared invalid because there was not a strict compliance with the statute.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway against the Clinch Valley Lumber Company. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Bond & Bruce, for plaintiff in error.
Vicars & Peery, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The principal question for decision in this case is whether an alleged agreement between the general manager of the plaintiff in error and the defendant in error for a flat rate of $10 per car for hauling the lumber of the defendant in error from Dante to Fink, and $5 from intermediate points (based on the minimum car weight of 30,000 pounds), when such rates were less than the schedule of charges for the same service established by the State Corporation Commission, is valid and binding upon the railway company.

The Lick Creek & Lake Erie Railroad Company owned and operated a railroad from Dante to its junction with the Norfolk & Western Railway at Fink. The company filed with the Corporation Commission a tariff of freight rates, which was approved by it, and became effective December 24, 1906, and remained in force until November 1, 1908. On January 1, 1907, that road leased its line of road to the plaintiff in error, a corporation then operating as the South & Western Railroad Company (now, by charter amendment, the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway). On April 9, 1907, a verified copy of the lease was filed with the Corporation Commission, and the former schedule of rates was continued, covering the period of the transactions out of which this litigation arose.

From January 1, to March 17, 1907, the defendant consigned its cars through to their ultimate destinations, where the entire freight was collected and the plaintiff's part, 3½ cents per hundredweight on lumber from Dante to Fink and 3 cents from intermediate points, was paid by the connecting carrier. About the last-named date the defendant changed its method of shipment, and consigned its cars to itself at Fink, and, having paid the flat rate to that point, reconsigned them to customers. The plaintiff at that time had not installed scales, and consequently had no means of ascertaining the actual weight of lumber shipped other than through connecting carriers.

[1] This action of assumpsit was brought to recover the difference between the flat rates, based on minimum car weight, and the schedule rates, founded on the actual weight of the lumber. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and filed with its plea a specification of defenses under section 3249 of the Code. As ground of defense it relied on the alleged agreement between the parties for the minimum car load rates, without regard to the actual weight of the lumber hauled; so that, under the authorities, the defense must be confined to that single issue. Oeters v. Knights of Honor, 98 Va. 201, 35 S. E. 356; City of Richmond v. Leaker, 99 Va. 6, 37 S. E. 348.

[2] The validity of the supposed contract was denied by the plaintiff, but the circuit court refused to give an instruction that it was unlawful for the defendant to willfully and knowingly obtain from the agents of the plaintiff, by contract or other means or device, transportation at less than the freight rate of the plaintiff authorized, prescribed, and published by the State Corporation Commission.

The evidence tended to show the existence, by lawful authority, of such a rate, and the court erred in refusing the instruction. The trend of decision condemns agreements of this character as contrary to public policy and void, and the rule of decision thus established has been carried into statute in this state. Code 1904, § 1294c, cl. 7.

[3] The circuit court also excluded from the consideration of the jury the lease from the Lick Creek & Erie Railroad Company to the plaintiff, on the ground that the statute (Code 1904, § 1294d, cl. 5b) requires every person or corporation operating a railroad in the state, under a contract or lease, to file the same in the office of the State Corporation Commission within 30 days after such contract or lease is executed. The plaintiff filed a verified copy of the lease on April 9, 1907.

The manifest object of the requirement is to furnish the Corporation Commission with information of the existence of the lease and its contents. By the Constitution of the state and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, the Corporation Commission is clothed with judicial, legislative, and executive functions, and possesses wide powers and discretion in the matter of establishing, regulating, and controlling freight and passenger rates. In the instant case it has seen fit to treat the filing of a verified copy of the lease as a sufficient compliance with the statute, and has received and acted upon the same accordingly. In these circumstances, a construction of the statute which would strike down a freight rate thus established and accepted by the plaintiff and the public would be to sacrifice substance to form. The substantial purpose of the statute was accomplished as effectually by filing the verified copy of the lease as it would have been by filing the original paper, and the discretion exercised by the Corporation Commission in that regard should be sustained.

For these reasons the judgment, which was adverse to the plaintiff, must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings not in conflict with this opinion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Action by Hurt & Hurt against Harman Blankenship and another, and suit by Hurt & Hurt against Harman Blankenship and another. From an order in the legal action vacating judgment rendered therein, plaintiffs appeal; and from a decree dismissing a petition for subrogation in the chancery suit an appeal was taken. Reversed.

J. Powell Royall and S. D. May, for appellants. Henson & Bowen, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. These two suits, the first at law and the second in chancery, from the circuit court of Tazewell county, were heard together by this court; the subject-matter in controversy being so involved in both as to make that the most convenient method of considering the question to be determined.

It appears that on November 22, 1905, Harman Blankenship bought from Hurt & Hurt a stock of merchandise, the consideration for which was his negotiable note for $530, payable 12 months after date, and indorsed, as an accommodation indorser, by his sister, Ida Blankenship. The note not being paid, Hurt & Hurt brought suit and obtained judgment thereon in May, 1907, against the maker and indorser, each of whom had been duly served with process. In June, 1907, Hurt & Hurt brought a chancery suit against these judgment debtors to enforce against their lands, respectively, the lien of their judgment. In this chancery cause process was duly served upon each of the defendants. After this bill was filed, Ida Blankenship, the sister, sold and conveyed her land, mentioned therein, to the plaintiffs in consideration of an assignment to her of their judgment against her brother and thereupon secured a decree in the pending chancery cause subrogating her to all of the rights of the judgment creditors with respect to such judgment. To her petition asking for this subrogation her brother was made a party defendant, and duly served with process. The cause was then referred to a commissioner to take an account of the lands of Harman Blankenship and the liens thereon. Notice of this account was duly served upon the defendant, after which the commissioner took the required account, reporting other liens, and, in favor of Ida Blankenship, the judgment asserted in the bill, the right to which she had been subrogated. This report, to which no exception was taken, was ratified and confirmed and a personal decree given against Harman Blankenship in favor of his sister for the amount of the judgment and costs, together with a decree nisi for the sale of the land reported as subject to the lien of such judgment. Three months after all of these proceedings were had with respect to this judgment, in each of which Harman Blankenship was made a party defendant and duly served with process, he appeared for the first time by a guardian ad litem and next friend with an answer, in which he claims that at the time of the rendition of the judgment involved in this litigation he was an infant of tender years and incapable of understanding and protecting his interests, and that the judgment was rendered without the appointment of a guardian ad litem to defend his interests as required by law. There was also filed at the same time an exception to the report of the commissioner, which had been confirmed, asserting in support thereof the claim of infancy set up in his answer. More than a month after this appearance in the chancery cause, Harman Blankenship gave his sister notice that he would move the court, on the law side thereof, to vacate and set aside her judgment, on the ground that he was an infant when the note sued on was executed, and when the judgment thereon was obtained.

A number of defenses to this motion were interposed, which it is not necessary to mention. Upon the trial, the parties submitted the matter in controversy to the determination of the court. After hearing the evidence, which included the record in the chancery cause, the court, upon the issue of infancy, held that Harman Blankenship was an infant when the judgment in controversy was obtained and vacated the same and set it aside. Subsequently the court in the chancery cause held that Ida Blankenship was entitled to no relief therein, her judgment there asserted having been vacated and annulled, and dismissed her petitions, both original and amended. From the common-law order vacating the judgment and from the decree dismissing the petitions of Ida Blankenship, these proceedings are now before this court.

[1, 2] Viewed from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, the testimony falls to satisfactorily or sufficiently establish the claim of Harman Blankenship that he was under 21 years of age either when the judgment in question was obtained, or when the note upon which it was based was executed. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, in the motion to vacate the judgment, to establish his claim of infancy. The only evidence offered in support of such claim was that of plaintiff's brother, Oscar, and himself, both shown to be interested in defeating the judgment. Neither of these witnesses profess to know with certainty the age of Harman Blankenship. Neither has ever seen any record of his age, and both admit that what they state with respect to his age was heard from other members of the family, whose names are not mentioned. The testimony of Harman Blankenship is that he did not know his age; that members of his family had told him that he was born about the 25th of March, 1888, or 1889; that he was either 20 or 21 years of age when testifying. This witness admits that for several years he had traded and done business as an adult; that the note upon which the judgment was rendered was given to Hurt & Hurt for a stock of goods; that he purchased these goods as an adult, and sold the same as such, and also purchased goods from wholesale firms; and that after merchandising at Big Creek, in Tazewell county, he carried on a mercantile business at Raven, in the same county. The testimony of Oscar Blankenship is that he did not know his brother's exact age; that he had never seen any record of it; that his information from the family was that Harman was born about the 25th of March, 1888, or 1889; that witness was 38 years of age; that his father died in the fall of 1889, and that Harman was then 8 or 18 months of age; that Harman was a married man and had five brothers, none of whom were present to testify with respect to his age but himself; that Harman Blankenship had for many years been conducting business for himself; that he had sold witness a stock of goods, or exchanged the same with him, in the year 1907, for the tract of land now sought to be sold in the pending chancery cause; and that he now holds the title bond of Harman Blankenship for said land.

It was admitted on the trial that the defendants could prove that the plaintiff Harman Blankenship told Hurt & Hurt at the time the note in question was executed that he was then 21 years of age, and that he told W. B. Spratt about the same time on two different occasions that he was then 21. This evidence is confirmed by the testimony of the plaintiff, who says that he purchased the goods for which the note was given as an adult, and sold the same as such.

In this case Harman Blankenship seeks, under the claim of infancy, to escape responsibility for his admittedly just obligation, and to impose the burden of that obligation upon his sister, who has, as his surety, been compelled to sell her land to meet his debt. To accomplish this, he must adduce clear and satisfactory proof that he was, as now claimed, an infant when the obligation in question was assumed. Taking the plaintiff's evidence as a whole, it leaves the mind not only in grave doubt as to the truth of the claim, but with a decided inclination to the conclusion that the present claim of infancy is an afterthought. The evidence for the plaintiff on this issue is uncertain and inconclusive, and, when it is considered in connection with the fact that he represented himself to be of age when he executed the note, that he purchased the stock of goods for which it was given as an adult, and had sold them as such, and had for a number of years carried on for himself the mercantile business, that he had important land transactions with his brother, Oscar, during the time he now claims to have been an infant, all of which statements and conduct are wholly irreconcilable with the present pretension with respect to his age, and when all this is considered together with the plaintiff's long and unexplained delay in making this defense of infancy, notwithstanding the numerous opportunities afforded at law and in equity when he should have set it up, the conclusion cannot be avoided that the plaintiff has failed to establish that he was an infant, either when the judgment sought to be vacated was rendered or when the note upon which it was based was executed.

The order in the common-law case, vacating the judgment, now belonging to Ida Blankenship, must therefore be set aside and the motion to vacate overruled, and the decree in the chancery cause, dismissing the original and amended petitions of Ida Blankenship, must be reversed and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings, enforcing the lien of the judgment in favor of Ida Blankenship against the land of Harman Blankenship in the proper order of its priority.

SMITH v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 14, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§§ 548, 597*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CREATED—FEE SIMPLE.

Testator directed that all his real estate be equally divided between his three sons, and that, if one or more should die leaving no issue, their share should fall back to the survivor, and they "to pay unto my four daughters hereinafter named the sum of $100 to be paid twelve months after the death of my wife." Held, that the three sons took a fee-simple estate with an additional limitation over, that, if any of them should die leaving no issue, his or their share should go to his or their surviving brothers or brother, and that the estate of the last surviving brother, if he should die leaving no issue, would not be defeated and go to his sisters, but would vest absolutely in him; there being no gift over.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. §§ 548, 597.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 8*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO CONVEYANCE—CONTINGENT INTERESTS.

Under Code 1904, § 2418, which provides that any interest in real estate may be disposed of by deed, that an estate may be made to commence in futuro by deed, and that any estate which would be good as an executory devise or bequest is good if created by deed, devisees of fee-simple estates, with an additional limitation over that, if one or more of them should die leaving no issue, his or their share, as the case might be, should go to the surviving devisees or devisee, have the right to convey all their title in the lands devised, both present and contingent.

3. DEEDS (§ 124*)—ESTATES CREATED—FEE SIMPLE.

Where an estate was devised to three brothers in fee simple, with an additional limitation over that, in the event of one or more of them dying without issue, his or their shares should go to the survivor, and by deeds of partition among themselves they relinquished their interest in the tract devised, with covenants of general warranty and recitals that the land conveyed was an undivided tract set apart to them by will, and that the object of the covenants was to make deeds of partition to each one and to grant described parts. Held, that under Code 1904, § 2438, relating to the construction of deeds, and section 2439, fixing the effect of certain words of release, that the language and warranty in the deeds was effectual to invest the grantee in each of those deeds with the absolute fee-simple title to that part of the land devised covered by the respective deeds.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Giles County.
Action by J. B. Smith against W. L. Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Snidow, for appellant. Harman & Pobst, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. The questions involved in this case depend upon the construction of the second clause of the will of George Hetherington and the effect of deeds of partition between his devisees under that clause of his will. That clause is as follows:

"Secondly, I direct that all my real estate in this county (Giles) and also all the land I own in Mercer county, W. Virginia, be equally divided between my three sons (Augustus, Giles B. and Newton C.) and in event that one or more should die leaving no issue, in that event that their share shall fall back to the surviving ones, and that they are to pay unto my four daughters hereafter named the sum of one hundred dollars, to be paid twelve months after the death of my wife."

The testator's three sons sold and conveyed the land devised them, which lies in the state of West Virginia, and no question as to their interest in it is involved in this case. The land devised, lying in Giles county, was divided into two parts. The eastern portion was conveyed on June 25, 1885, by Augustus S. and his wife and Giles B. and his wife to Newton C., and the western portion was conveyed by Augustus S. and his wife and Newton C., who has never married, to Giles B. No part of the Giles county land was conveyed to Augustus S.; he receiving from his brothers a money consideration in lieu of his interest in the land. These deeds contain substantially the same provisions. The granting clause of the deed from Augustus S. and Giles B. to Newton C. is as follows:

"Witnesseth: That the parties of the first part doth relinquish their title, right and interest in a certain tract or parcel of land containing 160 acres, more or less, lying and being in the county of Giles, Virginia, on the waters of the Bear spring, to Newton C. Hetherington, with covenants of general warranty. The interest here intended to be conveyed is one third part of 287 acres of land, to each one of which the late George Hetherington, the father of Augustus S. & Giles B. Hetherington, the grantors of the first part, died seized. The above land to be conveyed is an undivided tract land which was set apart by will to Augustus S., Giles B. and Newton C. Hetherington by their father, and the object of these covenants is to make deeds of partition to each one, and the parties of the first part grant to Newton C. Hetherington the east end of aforesaid tract, embracing the old homestead buildings & bounded as follows."

Newton C. conveyed the land thus acquired by him, with the English covenants and the covenant of general warranty, to John B. Smith, the appellee, in the year 1906. The latter conveyed the said land with like covenants to W. L. Smith, the appellant, in the year 1909. The vendee not having paid the deferred purchase-money notes, this suit was instituted to enforce the collection thereof.

It was agreed by the parties to the suit that, if John B. Smith, the complainant, had by his deed invested W. L. Smith, the appellee, with an absolute, indefeasible fee-simple title to the land involved, then the purchase-money lien was to be enforced; but, if the complainant had not conveyed such title, then the sale and conveyance were to be set aside, and the parties placed in statu quo.

The trial court was of opinion that the defendant, the appellant, had acquired under his conveyance from the complainant, the appellee, an absolute and indefeasible fee-simple title, and entered a decree subjecting the land to the payment of the unpaid purchase-money notes. From that decree this appeal was granted.

As before stated, the correctness of that decree depends upon the construction of the will of George Hetherington and the effect of the said deeds of partition between his devisees.

[1] The court is of opinion that under the will of George Hetherington his three sons, mentioned in the second clause thereof, took a fee-simple estate, with a conditional limitation over, viz., that, if one or more of them should die leaving no issue, his or their share, as the case might be, should go to his surviving brothers or brother. And the court is further of opinion that the estate of the last surviving brother, if he died leaving no issue, would not be defeated and go to his sisters, as insisted by the appellant, but would vest absolutely in him; there being no gift over.

"It is quite true," as was said by the Master of the Rolls, in Maden v. Taylor, 45 L. J. Ch. 572, "that the last liver does not survive himself, but he survives all the rest, and in that sense he is the survivor." In that case the devise was to trustees in trust for four nieces for their respective lives, as tenants in common, and on the death of them to the children of the person so dying, and on the death of any without issue, then to the "survivor or survivors." "Does any one," said the Master of the Rolls in discussing the question, "doubt that a gift to the survivor of ten people of a sum of money or an estate, with no previous gift at all, vests the sum of money or the estate absolutely in the last liver?"

In R. Don v. Schenk, 8 N. J. Law, 29, the testator had disposed of his lands as follows: "I give unto my son R. all my real estate excepting such part as I give and grant to my two daughters as hereinafter mentioned." After making a devise to his said daughters, he says: "My will is that if any of my children should happen to die without issue alive, that such share or dividend shall be divided by the survivor of them." It was held that R. took a fee-simple estate, defeasible on condition that he had no issue at his death and his sisters survived him. When the sisters died, he surviving them, the condition became impossible, and the estate then became an absolute fee-simple estate in R. See, also, Anderson v. Brown, 84 Md. 261, 35 Atl. 937; Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) 651; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 751, 752; 37 Cyc. 642; 2 Redfield on Wills, 376, 377.

[2, 3] The court is further of opinion that under the provisions of sections 2418, 2438, and 2439, of the Code, the devisees under the second clause of the will had the right to convey and relinquish all their right, title, and interest in the lands devised, both present and contingent, and that the effect of the language and the warranty in the deeds of June 25, 1885, was to invest the grantee in each of those deeds with the absolute fee-simple title to that portion of the land devised covered by the respective deeds. See Young v. Young, 89 Va. 675, 17 S. E. 470, 23 L. R. A. 642; Snyder v. Grandstaff, 96 Va. 473, 31 S. E. 647, 70 Am. St. Rep. 863; Wilson, Trustee, v. Langhorne, etc., 102 Va. 631, 47 S. E. 871.

Having reached the conclusion that Newton C. Hetherington, under his father's will and the deed of his brothers to him, executed June 25, 1885, acquired an absolute, indefeasible fee-simple title to that portion of the land devised covered by his deed, it follows that a like title was acquired by the appellant from his grantor, the appellee, that there is no error in the decree appealed from, and that it must be affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Russell County. Suit by James H. Shoemaker against John Shoemaker and others for partition. Upon the petition of the Chapman Drug Company and others a deed from Isaac Shoemaker to his son Bona Shoemaker was set aside, and Bona Shoemaker appeals. Reversed.

Routh & Routh, for appellant. S. B. Quillen, Finney & Wilson, and Burns & Kelly, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. This is an appeal from a decree setting aside a deed from Isaac Shoemaker to his son, Bona H. Shoemaker, as voluntary and fraudulent. The deed is dated December 14, 1908, and for the consideration of "$1,000.00 in hand paid" the grantor conveyed to the grantee his one-sixth undivided share in lands inherited from his brother, James Shoemaker, deceased.

At the date of the deed, a suit was pending in the circuit court of Russell county to sell these lands for partition among the heirs, and they were subsequently sold for that purpose. The appellant filed his petition in the suit, asserting title to one-sixth of the purchase money under his deed. The appellees (creditors of Isaac Shoemaker, whose debts were contracted prior to December 14, 1908, but whose judgments were subsequently recovered) likewise intervened by petitions in the principal suit, and attacked the deed as voluntary and made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud petitioners in the collection of their debts, and also that the grantee participated in the fraud. These allegations were denied, and upon the issues thus raised by the pleadings and evidence the circuit court annulled the deed, and directed an account of liens upon the share of Isaac Shoemaker in the land fund.

The circuit court held that the proof showed confidential relations between the grantor and grantee, which cast upon the latter the burden of proving the bona fides of the transaction.

[1] Conceding the relationship of the parties and the insolvency of the grantor, these conditions do not of themselves constitute badges of fraud, and relieve the creditors from the burden of proving the charges of fraud set forth in their pleadings.

In Johnson v. Lucas, 103 Va. 36, 48 S. E. 497, it was held that relationship was not a badge of fraud, and that there was no rule of law which forbade persons standing in near relations of consanguinity or affinity from dealing with each other. But it was said as fraud is generally accompanied by secret trust, that transactions between near relatives and persons occupying confidential relations toward each other where fraud is charged should be more closely scrutinized. Burwell v. Burwell, 103 Va. 314, 49 S. E. 68.

[2] So of insolvency, that condition does not deprive the owner of the right to sell his property, unless the sale is made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. Ferguson v. Daugherty, 94 Va. 308, 26 S. E. 822.

[3] Fraud, it is true, may be proved either by direct or circumstantial evidence but "it is not to be assumed on doubtful evidence or circumstances of mere suspicion. It must be clearly and distinctly proved. The law never presumes fraud, but the presumption is always in favor of innocence and honesty." New York Life Ins. Co. v. Davis, 96 Va. 737, 739, 32 S. E. 475, 44 L. R. A. 305.

In Redwood v. Rogers, 105 Va. 155, 53 S. E. 6, it is said: "The charge of fraud is one easily made, and the burden of proving it rests on the party alleging its existence. It may be proved, not only by positive and direct evidence, but by showing facts and circumstances sufficient to support the conclusion of fraud. But, however shown, the proof must be clear and convincing, and such as to satisfy the conscience of the chancellor, who should be cautious not to lend too ready an ear to the charge." See, also, Wheby v. Moir, 102 Va. 875, 47 S. E. 1005; Harrisonburg Co. v. Nat. Furn. Co., 106 Va. 302, 55 S. E. 679.

[4] Yet, when a prima facie case of fraud has been shown, the settled rule is that the burden shifts, and the defendants must establish the bona fides of the transaction. Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 478, 3 S. E. 131; Engleby v. Harvey, 93 Va. 445, 25 S. E. 225; American N. & T. Co. v. Mayo, 97 Va. 182, 33 S. E. 523.

[5] Moreover, in a suit by creditors to set aside a deed as voluntary and fraudulent, the recitals in the deed that the consideration has been paid are not sufficient to establish that fact, and the burden of proving such payment rests upon the grantee. Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639; Rogers v. Verlander, 30 W. Va. 619, 5 S. E. 847.

[6] If it be admitted that the circumstances are sufficient to show an intent on the part of Isaac Shoemaker by the sale to his son to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, nevertheless there is no evidence to fix notice of such intention upon the son.

The facts of this case may be summarized as follows: At the time of the transaction, Bona H. Shoemaker was living separate and apart from his father, and is not shown to have had personal knowledge of the demands against him. He was 29 years of age and unmarried; and he was a lumber inspector, and had been engaged in that occupation for 6 years, earning from $80 to $65 per month, and with no expense except for his clothes. He paid the entire purchase price for his father's share, $300, on February 16, 1909, and the residue March 3d following and put his deed to record March 19, 1909; and it is not pretended that $1,000 was not a fair price for the property.

In the decree under review, importance is attached to the recital in the deed that the purchase money was paid in hand, while, in fact, no money passed at that date. This is a common expression in deeds prepared in the country, and the unfavorable inference, which might otherwise be drawn from that circumstance, loses its significance in light of the evidence, which shows that the deed was not delivered on the day of its execution. [7] A deed is supposed to take effect from delivery, and though, as a general rule, it is presumed to have been delivered at its date or acknowledgment, it is always competent to show the actual time of delivery. 1 Devlin on Deeds, § 178. It is a fair inference from the evidence that the deed was not delivered until after payment of the purchase money.

Considering the evidence in the light of the well-settled principles of law applicable thereto, we are of opinion that the appellees have failed to sustain the charge of fraud with sufficient clearness and certainty to entitle them to a decree setting aside the deed.

For these reasons, the decree appealed from must be reversed, and the petitions of the appellees dismissed.

Error to Circuit Court, Buchanan County.

Action by John C. McCoy against P. L. Johnson and another, committee for Samuel M. Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Greever & Gillisple and M. O. Litz, for plaintiffs in error. Chase & Daugherty and S. M. Coulling, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. In this action of ejectment the defendant in error was plaintiff, and the plaintiffs in error were defendants in the lower court. [1] The theory of the plaintiff is that both parties claim the land sued for from a common source, Asheville H. Smith, and hence it was unnecessary for him to trace title beyond the common grantor. Bolling v. Teel, 76 Va. 493; Chesterman v. Bolling, 102 Va. 471, 46 S. E. 470; Casselman v. Bialas, 112 Va. —, 70 S. E. 479.

Plaintiff's chain of title is under a deed from Justus to himself, dated August 8, 1907, and a deed from Matilda Smith to Justus, dated July 31, 1906. He also endeavored to show that Asheville H. Smith devised all of his real estate to his wife, Matilda, and, moreover, that a tract of 75 acres, which includes the disputed land, was conveyed to her in fee simple by the heirs at law of her late husband by deed dated September 23, 1889.

The defendants controvert both propositions. They deny that Asheville H. Smith devised his lands to his wife, and insist that upon a correct interpretation of the deed of September 23, 1889, Matilda Smith took a life estate only in the land, with remainder to her son, Samuel M. Smith, in fee. Matilda was dead at the date of the deed from Justus to McCoy, and therefore, if she only had a life estate in the land, McCoy took nothing by his deed.

The elder Smith left a will, which was admitted to probate, and, along with other court records in Buchanan county, was destroyed by fire in 1882. The evidence touching the contents of the will is, however, entirely too vague and uncertain to afford a safe guide to the court in determining what disposition the testator made of his property. Much of the testimony on that point was hearsay, and the witnesses who either claim to have read the will themselves or to have heard it read by others speak from memory after the lapse of half a century, and give their opinions as to the legal effect of the instrument rather than its precise language.

[2] It is settled law that, where a plaintiff claims title under a lost or destroyed paper, "the proof of its former existence, contents, and loss or destruction must be strong and conclusive before the court will permit a title to be established by parol evidence." Carter v. Wood, 103 Va. 68, 48 S. E. 553.

The circuit court erred in overruling defendants' motion to exclude the evidence in support of the contention that the testator devised his lands to his wife.

The only other assignment of error which demands our attention involves the construction of the deed of September 23, 1889. The circuit court denied defendants' prayer for an instruction, that the deed conveyed a life estate to Matilda Smith with remainder to Samuel M. Smith in fee, and, in lieu thereof, told the jury that the former took a fee simple under the deed.

Before undertaking to interpret this deed, reference to some of the elementary principles of construction may be helpful. [3] The expositor, as was said by a learned judge (Mr. Justice Sanderson in Walsh v. Hill, 38 Cal. 481, 487), should place himself in the position "occupied by the parties at the time the instrument was executed; then, taking it by its four corners, read it."

[4] It is also a cardinal rule in the construction of all writings that the intention of the parties, when it can be obtained from the instrument itself, will prevail unless counteracted by some positive rule of law. 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 836. And when such intent is apparent, and not repugnant to some rule of law, it must prevail over mere technical terms, "for the intent * * * is the essence of every agreement. In the exposition of deeds, the construction must be upon the view and comparison of the whole instrument, and with an endeavor to give every part of it meaning and effect. * * * If the deed contains a clause decisively showing the intention of the parties, ambiguities and inconsistencies in other clauses of the deed will not defeat such intention."

Section 837. [5] The circumstances connected with the transaction and the situation of the parties are of value, and may always be considered in arriving at their intention. Section 839.

[6] "Grammatical construction is not always to be followed, and it has been said that neither false English nor bad Latin will avoid a deed when the meaning of the party is apparent." Section 843.

[7] Again, it has been held that punctuation "is a most fallible standard by which to interpret a writing. It may be resorted to when all other means fail; but the court will first take the instrument by its four corners in order to ascertain its true meaning. If that is apparent, on judicially inspecting the whole, the punctuation will not be suffered to change it." Mr. Justice Baldwin, in Ewing v. Burnet, 11 Pet. 41, 9 L. Ed. 624.

In the light of these fundamental principles, let us approach the construction of the deed in question. Omitting merely formal parts, it reads as follows:

"This deed, made this 23 day of September, 1889, between * * * heirs at law of Asheville H. Smith, deceased, of the first part, and Matilda Smith of the second part * * * witnesseth: for the consideration of each of one part of the estate of the said A. H. Smith, the party of the first part does grant unto the party of the second part all the following parcel of land, containing 75 acres, * * * with covenants of general warranty, unto the said Matilda Smith during her life time, then at her decease to Samuel M. Smith her son."

At the time of this conveyance Matilda Smith and her son Samuel were living together on the 75 acres of land. All the other heirs of Asheville H. Smith, by deed of partition, had received in severalty their shares of the lands of their father; and, unless this deed is to be construed as conveying a life estate to the mother with remainder to the son, Samuel will take no part of the estate.

We think the deed, though evidently prepared by an illiterate person, bears internal evidence of the fact that it constitutes part of a general scheme for the partition of the lands of the elder Smith among his widow and heirs. The consideration shows that such was its purpose. To give full effect to the intention of the parties in one deed, it was necessary that Samuel M. Smith should occupy the dual relation of grantor and grantee in the same instrument—of grantor to make perfect his mother's life estate in the land, and of grantee to receive from his co-heirs his share of the inheritance. [8] The deed is inartificially drawn. It contains no formal, well-defined clauses, and should not be controlled by technical rules of construction applicable to repugnant stipulations. It is composed practically of only one sentence, the granting clause, with a covenant of general warranty parenthetically introduced, followed by a comma and a capital. But the original granting clause applies as unmistakably to the remainder to the son, after the death of the mother as it does to the life estate of the latter. The grant to Matilda Smith, in the beginning of the sentence, is not of a fee simple, and consequently is not repugnant to the qualifying language which follows and limits the estate granted to an estate for her life.

As was said in Pack v. Whitaker, 110 Va. 122, 126, 65 S. E. 496, 498, "there is no repugnancy between the granting and the habendum clauses, since the former does not in terms grant a fee-simple estate."

[9] In conclusion, we are of opinion that upon a fair construction of the deed Matilda Smith took a life estate in the seventy-five acres of land, with remainder to Samuel M. Smith in fee.

It follows from these views that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 83*)—"LAST CLEAR CHANCE."

The doctrine of the last clear chance rests upon the principle that there is something in the plaintiff's condition or situation to admonish the defendant that he is not able to protect himself. It is the doctrine of prior and subsequent negligence, or remote and proximate cause, and presupposes the intervention of an appreciable interval of time between the prior negligence of the plaintiff and the subsequent negligence of the defendant. It applies notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the plaintiff when the defendant knows, or by the exercise of ordinary care ought to know, of plaintiff's danger, and fails to do something which it has power to do to avoid the injury, or when the plaintiff is in some position of danger from a threatened contact with some agency under the control of the defendant, when the plaintiff cannot and the defendant can prevent a resulting injury.

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 103*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

Where the evidence in an action for personal injuries showed that the accident occurred instantaneously with plaintiff's stepping upon defendant's street railroad track, and makes it clear that, if his danger was discovered or might have been discovered, it was not possible to have stopped the car in time to have avoided a collision, the last clear chance doctrine does not apply.

4. TRIAL (§ 267*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MODIFICATION BY COURT.

In an action against a street railroad for injuries to a person on its track, the court's modification of defendant's instructions as to contributory and concurrent negligence by appending the last clear chance doctrine to the instructions is error, as the instructions were intended to present defendant's theory of the case, and should have been given without qualification.

6. STREET RAILROADS (§ 98*)—CARE OF PERSON CROSSING TRACK—VIEW OF CROSSING OBSTRUCTED.

8. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

An instruction in an action for injuries sustained on a street railroad crossing, which denies a recovery to plaintiff if he failed to use ordinary care and caution at the time of and prior to the accident, is erroneous because of its omission to state that the assumed failure of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care, must have efficiently contributed to the injury.

9. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—LOOKING AND LISTENING.

It is not negligent as a matter of law for a person to go upon a street car track without looking and listening.

10. TRIAL (§ 243*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-CONTRADICTORY INSTRUCTIONS.

Requested instructions in an action for injuries on a street car track, that it was not negligence for a person to go upon the track without looking and listening, but that the law required that a person must use due care and must look and listen before going on the track, especially where the approach is partially obstructed, is self-contradictory, and properly refused.

Error to Corporation Court of City of Roanoke.

Action by John O. Carroll against the Roanoke Railway & Electric Company and the City of Roanoke. Action discontinued as to the City of Roanoke. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Roanoke Railway & Electric Company brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Plaintiff's first instruction was given as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that a street car running and operating its cars on the streets of a city must use greater care and diligence to prevent injury to persons and property than is required of them in running and operating their cars in less frequented and populous localities, and so in certain localities in the city greater precautions may be necessary than in others; for example, if a car is being run past an obstruction in the street and near to its tracks so that objects or persons on the other side of it are hidden from view, it is required of the street car company to resort to special precautions, depending upon the particular locality and the circumstances, to avoid accidents, and any neglect of any such precautions as are proper under the peculiar surroundings and circumstances of the locality constitutes negligence, for which the street car company is liable in damages, unless the plaintiff by the exercise of ordinary care on his part could have prevented the accident, and the burden is on the street car company to prove such absence of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff."

Defendant's eighth instruction, which read,

"The court instructs the jury that, even though they may believe from the evidence that the approach to the track which defendant's car was approaching was partially obstructed by a pile of lumber, yet that fact did not lessen the care and caution required of plaintiff in attempting to cross, but, on the contrary, imposed on him a higher degree of caution"

—was modified and given as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, even though they may believe from the evidence that the approach to the track on which defendant's car was approaching was partially obscured by a pile of lumber, yet that fact did not lessen the care and caution required of plaintiff in attempting to cross, but the existence of such obstruction should be considered by the jury in ascertaining what is reasonable care on the part of a person crossing said track."

The following instructions requested by defendant were refused:

"(2) The court instructs the jury that, while it is not negligence as a matter of law for a traveler to go upon a street car track without looking and listening, it is a settled principle of law that one who approaches a street railway track must use due care, and ordinary due care means that he must look and listen, and especially is this so where the approach to the track is partially obstructed.

"(3) The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff attempted to cross defendant's track at a point where its cars frequently passed to the knowledge of plaintiff, and where a view of the tracks was partially obstructed by a pile of lumber near the track, then it was the duty of the plaintiff to look and listen before attempting to cross the track, and if the jury shall believe from the evidence that he failed to look and listen, and that his failure so to do either caused or contributed proximately to his injury, then he was guilty of contributory negligence, and there can be no recovery in this case, though the jury may believe from the evidence that the defendant was negligent

"(4) The court instructs the jury that, though they may believe from the evidence that the defendant company was negligent, still the plaintiff cannot recover in this case if they shall also believe from the evidence that he failed to exercise ordinary care and caution at the time of and prior to the accident, and by ordinary care is meant that degree of care, caution, and prudence which an ordinary prudent and cautious man would exercise under like circumstances."

"(15) The court instructs the jury that if they believe that the collision in which the plaintiff was injured occurred in the market or public square, and not at the crossing at the east side of said square, then the duties imposed by law upon the defendant as to the manner of approaching crossings with its cars do not apply to this case.

Hall, Woods & Jackson, for plaintiff in error. Hairston, Hairston & Willis and Scott, Altizer & Watts, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This action was brought by John O. Carroll against the Roanoke Railway & Electric Company and the city of Roanoke, demanding damages in the sum of $50,000 for personal injuries sustained by him through the alleged joint negligence of the defendants. The negligence imputed to the city was that it permitted lumber to be piled in the street so near the track of the Railway & Electric Company as to partially shut out the view of approaching cars. The case was discontinued as to the city, and therefore we need not concern ourselves about its alleged complicity in the accident.

The salient facts of the case lie within narrow limits. The scene of the accident was the intersection of Nelson street and Campbell avenue, adjacent to Market Square. The street runs north and south, and the avenue east and west. The defendant maintains a double track along Campbell avenue, over which it operates a system of electric cars. The north track is used for west-bound cars, and the south tracks for cars going east. At the time of the accident the view of a pedestrian approaching Campbell avenue from the north (along the route traveled by the plaintiff) of cars coming from the east was partially obstructed by a building in course of erection near the northeast corner of Campbell avenue and the Market Square, and a pile of lumber 8 feet high, 9 feet wide, and 14 feet long, extending along the avenue to the outer edge of the sidewalk, and to within 44 inches of the defendant's northern rail. The view was, furthermore, obstructed by a large sand box and an upright engine connected by belting with a concrete mixer. After passing the lumber pile, the eastwardly view along the avenue was clear. A car station is located one square east from the corner of Nelson street and Campbell avenue on the south side of the avenue.

The plaintiff was 43 years old, and in possession of all his faculties. He was working in the Norfolk & Western Railway Company's shops in the city, and lived at Midway, on the defendant's line between Roanoke and Vinton. He had lived in the vicinity of Roanoke for about 14 years, and knew that the defendant maintained a double track along Campbell avenue, over which its cars frequently passed; and he occasionally used the cars in going from the city to his home. The accident occurred about 9:30 o'clock on the night of July 17, 1909, but the square was lighted by electricity. The plaintiff crossed Market Square diagonally in the direction of the junction of Nelson street and Campbell avenue. He thought the Vinton car had passed that point, and was hurrying to catch it at the station. The course mapped out in his mind for that purpose was along the north side of Campbell avenue, but, as he approached the corner, he discovered that the sidewalk was obstructed by the lumber pile, whereupon he determined to cross over to the south side. The evidence tended to show that the point from which he attempted to cross was about 15 feet west of the lumber, the southern line of which, as marked, was 44 inches from the northern rail of the track, and the distance from that rail to the outer edge of the running board of the car was 23 inches, which left a clear space of only 21 inches between the running board and the lumber pile.

Plaintiff admits that he did not look to see whether a car was coming immediately before going on the track (though it was in evidence that an approaching car would have been visible for a distance of over 40 feet from the point at which he attempted to cross), but looked straight ahead. To quote his language: "I stepped into the track, and the car hit me just like that [snapping his hands together], and knocked me a distance; and, before I could recover myself, it was on me and dragged me. It didn't knock me senseless, though."

As the result of the accident he lost both legs above the knees, and the jury awarded him $12,000 damages.

Conceding in the outset (as must be done, viewing the case from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence by the defendant) that the charges of negligence against the company, namely, excessive speed, failure of the motorman to have his car under control, to give the proper crossing signals, and to keep a lookout, were proved, the defendant nevertheless denies liability on the ground that the plaintiff was himself guilty of contributory negligence. In other words, the theory of the defendant is that the case was one of concurrent negligence.

On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that the charge of contributory negligence was not sustained, but insists that, if it had been proved, the evidence for the defendant warranted the application of the doctrine of the last clear chance.

The evidence relied on for that purpose is the testimony of a civil engineer, who gave estimates of how far the plaintiff could have seen a car coming along the north track from the east, at distances of 10, 20, 30, and 40 feet, respectively, from the track, from a point 15 feet west of the lumber pile, the argument of counsel in that regard being that, if the plaintiff might have seen the car, the motorman could likewise have seen the plaintiff in time to have stopped the car and avoided the collision.

[1] The obvious answer to that contention is that ordinarily a motorman rests under no obligation to stop his car merely because he sees a pedestrian approaching the track. The foot man is in a place of safety. He has absolute control of his movements and can stop instantly, and it is reasonable to assume that he will stop and wait for the car to pass, and not attempt to cross immediately in front of it. Backus v. Norfolk & Atl. Ter. Co., 112 Va. —, 71 S. E. 528, and cases cited. It would be impossible to operate street cars in a city on any other theory.

[2] There have been numerous cases involving the doctrine of the last clear chance decided by this court, and the underlying principle pervading all of them is that there is something in the plaintiff's condition or situation to admonish the defendant that he is not able to protect himself.

In Southern Railway Company v. Bailey, 110 Va. 833, 67 S. E. 365, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 379, the doctrine is stated in the syllabus as follows: "The doctrine of the 'last clear chance' applies, notwithstanding the contributory negligence of a plaintiff, when the defendant knows, or by the exercise of ordinary care ought to know, of plaintiff's danger, and it is obvious he cannot extricate himself from it, and fails to do something which it has power to do to avoid the injury; or when the plaintiff is in some position of danger from a threatened contact with some agency under the control of the defendant, when the plaintiff cannot, and the defendant can, prevent the injury. The plaintiff must show that at some time, in view of the entire situation, including his own negligence, the defendant was thereafter culpably negligent, and that such negligence was the latest in succession of causes. In such case the plaintiff's negligence is not the proximate cause of the injury. But this doctrine has no application to a case where both parties are equally guilty of neglect of an identical duty, the consequences of which continue on the part of both to the moment of the injury and proximately contribute thereto."

The doctrine is one of prior and subsequent negligence, or remote and proximate cause, and presupposes the intervention of an appreciable interval of time between the prior negligence of the plaintiff and the subsequent negligence of the defendant. Where the negligence of both continues down to the moment of the accident and contributes to the injury, the case is one of concurring negligence, and there can be no recovery.

[3] The testimony given by the plaintiff himself shows that the accident occurred instantaneously with his stepping upon the track, and it is clear that after his danger was discovered, or might have been discovered, it was not possible to have stopped the car in time to have avoided the collision. The case in that aspect is ruled by that line of decisions of which Richmond Traction Co. v. Martin, 102 Va. 209, 45 S. E. 886, is a type. The trial court, therefore, erred in giving an independent instruction involving the doctrine of the last clear chance.

[4] It also erred in appending that principle to the defendant's instructions 6, 7, 10, and 12. Even if the doctrine had been applicable, the instructions which the court modified were intended to present the defendant's theory of the case, and they ought to have been given without the qualification. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Stone, 111 Va. 730, 734, 69 S. E. 927.

[5-6] The defendant's objection to that part of plaintiff's instruction No. 1 which told the jury that, if the view of the crossing was obstructed, it imposed upon the defendant the duty of using special precautions, depending upon the particular location and circumstances, to avoid accident, may be considered in connection with the ruling of the court in modifying defendant's instruction No. 8. The two instructions were counterparts of each other, and both ought to have been given. Imp. Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. Ed. 403; A. & D. R. Co. v. Relger, 95 Va. 418, 28 S. E. 590; A. & D. R. Co. v. Ironmonger, 95 Va. 625, 629, 29 S. E. 319; Southern Ry. Co. v. Jones, 106 Va. 412, 56 S. E. 155; Southern Ry. Co. v. Hansbrough, 107 Va. 733, 60 S. E. 58. The obligation of the plaintiff and defendant with respect to the duty imposed upon them was reciprocal, and the principle might well have been incorporated in one instruction. The suggestion that it imposes upon the parties a higher degree of responsibility than ordinary care is without merit. Ordinary care is a relative, flexible term, dependent upon the facts and circumstances of each case. Of course, when the view at a crossing is clear and unobstructed, the degree of vigilance resting upon the parties is not so great as where it is obstructed. What might be common prudence in the one case would be gross negligence in the other. It was this principle that the instructions were intended to impress.

The court refused to give defendant's instructions 2, 3, 4, and 15. These will be briefly considered in inverse order.

[7] No. 15 was rightly refused. The accident happened too near the crossing as to bring it within the influence of the rules applicable to that class of cases.

[8] Instruction No. 4 was amenable to objection, because it omitted to state that the assumed failure of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care must have efficiently contributed to the injury. Washington, etc., R. Co. v. Vaughan, 111 Va. 785, 795, 69 S. E. 1035.

[9, 10] Instruction No. 2 initially told the jury that it was not negligence as a matter of law for a person to go upon a street car track without looking and listening (Bass v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 100 Va. 1, 40 S. E. 100), but concluded with the proposition that the law requires that such person must use due care, and that ordinary care means that he must look and listen before going on the track, especially where the approach is partially obstructed. The instruction is self-contradictory, and ought not to have been given.

So, with instruction No. 3, it told the jury that, if the view of the approaching car was partially obstructed by a pile of lumber near the track, then it was the duty of the plaintiff, as a matter of law, to look and listen before going on the track. The jury ought rather to have been told in both instructions that the circumstances upon which they are predicated must be considered by them in determining whether the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care. [11] It may also be noted that the questions dealt with in these last two instructions are covered by defendant's instructions 6 and 7.

For the foregoing errors, the judgment complained of must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Roanoke.

Action by the Bankers' Loan & Investment Company against W. H. Wainwright and another. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

A. B. Hunt and Woods & McNulty, for plaintiffs in error. Hall, Woods & Jackson, for defendant in error.

WHITLE, J. This writ of error brings under review a judgment for $945, recovered by the defendant in error against the plaintiffs in error for alleged arrearages of rent arising out of a contract of lease of the Academy Hotel in Roanoke city.

The lease bears date April 2, 1907, and demised the premises to the defendants for the term of five years, determinable at the option of the lessee in certain contingencies before the expiration of the term. Among other provisions, the lease stipulated that the property should be used "for hotel, billiard and pool room, and saloon," and the defendants covenanted not to use the building for any other purposes, "or to sublet said building, or any portion thereof, to be used for any other purpose without the consent" of the lessor. The agreed rental was $154 per month for the first 11 months ending with the license year, $187 per month for the second year, and $189 per month for the residue of the term, for the payment whereof the lessees bound themselves jointly and severally.

The lease also stipulated that in the event a license could not be obtained for the sale of liquor, or, if obtained, that the right to conduct a barroom should cease, the lessees, at their option, might abrogate the contract within 60 days after the end of the license year, provided the failure to procure license was not due to the default, neglect, or misconduct of the lessees in the manner of conducting the premises as a saloon or hotel, by giving immediate notice to the lessor of the failure to obtain such license, or to continue the lease under the contract, except the right to conduct the saloon, until the end of the term, in which latter event there should be an abatement of the rent equal to 25 per cent. of the monthly installments accruing after the expiration of the license year. The lease further stipulated that the lessees should immediately notify the lessor of any objection that might be raised to the granting of such license, and that the lessor should have the right to employ counsel at the expense of the lessees to assist in making application for and in attempting to procure the same. There were other covenants in the lease which do not demand special notice.

The defendants took possession of the property in May, 1907, and sublet the hotel portion, conducting personally the barroom as partners, until February 14, 1908, when Wainwright sold his interest to Ayres. Ayres continued the business, paying the rent to Turner & Turner, local agents for the plaintiffs at Roanoke, until July 17, 1908, when he assigned one-half of his interest to G. K. Moore. Ayres and Moore then continued the business jointly until the latter part of March, 1909, when Ayres assigned his interest to Moore.

At the April term, 1909, of the corporation court, Moore made application for a barroom license for the license year commencing May 1, 1909, and ending April 30, 1910, but license was denied; the evidence tending to show that the court had determined to refuse all liquor licenses in that section of the city. Thereupon Ayres and Moore on April 30, 1910, united in giving notice to the lessor of their election to terminate the tenancy by registered letter addressed to the home office of the plaintiff in New York, and by delivering a copy to the local agents in Roanoke. During the month of May following, Clark, the president, and Turner & Turner, the local agents, informed Ayres that they would not accept the surrender of the property, but would hold the original lessees responsible for the entire rent.

The misunderstanding between the parties growing out of the foregoing facts, and others which need not be specifically mentioned, culminated in the litigation which resulted in the judgment complained of.

[1] The controlling assignment of error involves the ruling of the trial court in the matter of giving and refusing instructions.

The court refused the prayer of the defendants to instruct the jury that the lease was assignable; and, as corollary to that interpretation of the contract, at the instance of the plaintiff, told the jury that the application of Moore, the assignee of the lease, for a barroom license, and the refusal of the court to grant such license, was not a sufficient compliance with the covenant of the lease to authorize the abrogation of the contract and surrender of the premises by the lessees.

It is settled law that, in the absence of express prohibition, all leases are assignable. The general doctrine is stated in Taylor's Landlord and Tenant (7th Ed.) § 402, as follows: "The power of assignment is incident to the estate of every lessee, unless he has been restrained by the terms of his lease. A covenant, however, not to assign or underlet the premises, without the express permission of the landlord, * * * is frequently inserted in a lease."

In section 403, the learned author observes: "Covenants of this description (not to assign or underlet) are construed by courts of law with the utmost jealousy, to prevent the restraint from going beyond the express stipulation."

So in 2 Minor on Real Property, § 1226, after stating the general rule that every estate and interest in lands and tenements may be assigned, it is said "that if, in leases for life or years, it is intended to restrict or bar the power of assignment, it must be done by special and precise stipulations."

In 1 Minor on Real Property, § 417, it is stated that "such restrictions are not favored by the law and are strictly construed."

The language employed in this instance is plain and unambiguous, and leaves no room for construction. The premises are to be used "for a hotel, billiard and pool room, and a saloon," and the lessees "agree not to use said building for any other purpose, or to sublet said building, or any portion thereof to be used for any other purpose without the consent" of the lessor. The manifest intendment of this covenant is that the lessees may sublet the premises without the consent of the lessor for the purposes specified; and it was not contended in argument that the assignment to Moore was a violation of the restrictive covenant.

[2] The error in the ruling of the trial court that the assignment to Moore was invalid was fundamental. It permeated practically all of the subordinate questions involved, and cut up by the roots the several defenses sought to be interposed by the defendants.

There was no contention that the assignment relieved the original lessees, Wainwright and Ayres, from personal liability to pay rent, and to see that all covenants imposed upon them by the contract were performed. But they did contend that the assignment to Moore was valid, and that, in certain contingencies, he had the right to give notice and terminate the tenancy. In these contentions the defendants were plainly within their rights under the contract. They introduced evidence tending to show that they and their subtenants had discharged all the obligations imposed upon them by the terms of the lease, that the contingency had arisen which authorized its abrogation, and that due notice of their election to terminate the tenancy had been given. The court ought, therefore, to have held as matter of law that the various assignments of the lease were lawful; and pertinent issues raised by the evidence (though controverted by the plaintiff) should have been submitted to the determination of the jury upon proper instructions.

It follows from these views that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial to be had therein not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 269*)—DECLARATIONS OF THIRD PERSONS.

In an action on a fire policy transferred to plaintiff, in which defendant claimed that the fire was caused by plaintiff or with his consent, evidence of declarations by the original insured, about a month before the fire, that there would shortly be a big fire, which would burn up the block, and of his inquiry as to who owned the nearby buildings, and whether they were insured, was not admissible as against plaintiff, in absence of evidence connecting him with the declarations, though it appears that plaintiff owed declarant a balance on the price of the property purchased; declarant not being a party thereto.

2. INSURANCE (§ 308*)—FIRE INSURANCE—COMPLIANCE WITH CONDITIONS.

An insured is only required to make a reasonable and substantial compliance with the conditions of a fire policy in order to sue thereon.

3. INSURANCE (§ 669*)—FIRE INSURANCE—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—AMOUNT AWARDED.

An instruction, in an action on a fire policy, that if the jury believe that plaintiff should recover they should assess the value of the property "as of the time of the fire, and find for plaintiff three-fourths of the said value," could not have misled the jury to fix any other value than the actual cash value of the property on the day of the fire, though it might have been well to have directly so instructed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 669.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 552*) — FIRE INSURANCE—PROOF OF LOSS.

Misstatements in the proof of loss, or insured's examination under oath, would not prevent recovery on a fire policy, unless they were intentionally made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1358; Dec. Dig. § 552.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—FIRE INSURANCE—INSTRUCTIONS—PROOF OF LOSS — EFFECT OF MISSTATEMENTS.

In an action on a fire policy transferred to plaintiff by the original insured, there was evidence that plaintiff, in making his proof of loss and in his examination under oath, based his estimate of the value of the destroyed articles upon invoices shown him by the original insured when he purchased the goods, a month before the fire, and that some of the articles were excessively valued, and others shown in the proof did not exist, and the evidence made it a jury question whether plaintiff, in making proof of loss, had reason to and did believe that the invoices were correct. The court instructed that, if plaintiff in his proof of loss or examination adopted any statement of any one which was false, without attempting to know or investigate the truth of such matters, "and without any grounds for adopting said statement," he became responsible therefor as false, requiring a finding for defendant. Held, that, while it would have been better to have used the word "reasonable" before "grounds," it was not affirmative error to modify the instruction by inserting the quoted words; it not appearing that defendant was prejudiced thereby.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by M. D. Nidiffer against the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Bond & Bruce and Geo. W. St. Clair, for plaintiff in error. W. S. Cox and Morton & Parker, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. M. D. Nidiffer brought his action of assumpsit against the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company on a policy of insurance issued by that company to J. W. Hill and transferred by the latter to the plaintiff. There was a verdict and judgment in the trial court against the insurance company, and to that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The errors assigned are based upon the action of the court in excluding evidence, in giving and refusing instructions, and in overruling the motion to set aside the verdict of the jury because contrary to the law and the evidence.

[1] The evidence excluded tended to show that J. W. Hill, to whom the policy was originally issued, had said, about a month before the fire which destroyed the property insured, that there would be a big fire before long, which would burn up the block, and inquired of the witness, who owned property near by, whether or not she was insured. One of the grounds of defense relied on was that the origin of the fire was known to the plaintiff and was originated by his acts, or that the property was destroyed with his consent by some one in privity with him. To sustain that contention it is claimed that the rejected evidence was admissible, upon the ground that Hill was interested in the policy to the extent of $500, balance of the purchase price due him on the insured property which he had sold to the plaintiff.

Hill was no party to the action, and his declarations as to what would happen to the property insured ought not to prejudice or affect the rights of the plaintiff, to whom the property and the policy had been transferred, whether theretofore or thereafter, in the absence of evidence connecting the plaintiff in any way with what Hill said about the burning of the property. There being no such evidence, the court properly rejected the alleged declarations of Hill.

The giving of instructions Nos. 1 and 2, asked for by the plaintiff, is assigned as error.

Those instructions are as follows:

(1) "The court instructs the jury that if they believe by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff has fairly and reasonably complied with the terms of the policy of insurance, and if they further believe that the policy was issued to J. W. Hill and regularly transferred to the plaintiff, and that the property was afterwards destroyed by fire, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover."

(2) "The court further tells the jury that if they believe that the plaintiff is entitled to recover they shall assess the value of the property as of the time of the fire, and find for the plaintiff three-fourths of said value in a sum not to exceed $1,000."

The objection made to instruction No. 1 is that a fair and reasonable compliance with the terms of the policy of insurance on the part of the plaintiff was not sufficient to entitle him to recover, but such right depended upon a literal compliance with the provisions of the policy.

[2] The general rule in this state is that, in an action on a policy of insurance against fire, all that can be required of the plaintiff is a reasonable and substantial compliance with the conditions of the policy. See Home Ins. Co. v. Cohen, 20 Grat. 312; Lynchburg Fire Ins. Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575, 581-583, 44 Am. Rep. 177; North British & Mer. Ins. Co. v. Edmundson, 104 Va. 486, 52 S. E. 350.

There is nothing in this case, so far as we can see, to take it out of the general rule, or which shows that instruction No. 1 did not properly state the law applicable to the case.

[3] The objection made to instruction No. 2 is that it does not restrict the jury in assessing the value of the property destroyed to its actual cash value at the day of the fire, as provided by the policy, but left it to them to assess the property at the excessive value placed upon it by the plaintiff. While it might have been better to have told the jury that in assessing the damages, if any, they were to be governed by the actual cash value of the property destroyed at the time of loss, we do not think that the jury could have been misled by the language used, in fixing any other than a cash value upon the property destroyed at that date.

The defendant offered ten instructions. Seven of them were given as offered. Three—Nos. 5, 6, and 7—were modified by the court and given. The action of the court in not giving instructions Nos. 5 and 6 as offered is assigned as error.

Instruction No. 5, as offered, was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that all inquiry by the defendant company as to the articles destroyed and the value of same, for which the plaintiff seeks to recover in this action, was material; that both in the proof of loss and examination under oath of plaintiff the defendant had a right to have the truth from plaintiff, whatever plaintiff's intention might have been, and if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff stated, either in the proof of loss or examination under oath, that more articles were destroyed than he had in the building, or stated that he had a greater number of articles than he actually had, and that same were burned, then that is false swearing within the meaning of the policy, and you must find for the defendant."

[4] The instruction as offered denied the right of the plaintiff to recover if he had made misstatements, either in his proof of loss or in his examination under oath, no matter how innocently made. The modification made in the instruction by the court told the jury that such misstatements or mistakes would not deprive him of the right to recover, unless they were made intentionally or knowingly. The modification made in the instruction was clearly right. See Va. Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Hogue, 105 Va. 355, 366, 54 S. E. 8, and authorities cited.

[5] Instruction No. 6, as amended by the court, is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence plaintiff in his proof of loss or examination under oath adopted any statement of any one which was false without attempting to know or investigate the truth of such matters for himself, and without any grounds for adopting said statement, he thereby became responsible for such statement as false within the meaning of the policy and you must find for the defendant."

The instruction as offered did not contain the words in italics.

There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, in making his proof of loss and in answering questions under oath, based his estimate of the values of the articles destroyed upon invoices shown him by Hill when he (plaintiff) made his purchase about one month before the property insured was destroyed by fire. There is also evidence tending to show that some articles were excessively valued and that others never had any existence. The contention of the defendant was, and is, that the plaintiff had no right to adopt Hill's invoices or statements, which were incorrect, without investigating the truth of their contents. The contention of the plaintiff, on the other hand, was, and is, that he purchased the property only a short time before the fire upon the faith of such invoices; that he considered Hill a man of truth and integrity, and did not scrutinize his statements as carefully as he would have scrutinized those of a stranger; and that, even if there were mistakes, which is denied, in his proof of loss or in his answers under oath, such mistakes were not intentionally or recklessly made.

Whether or not the plaintiff, in making his proof of loss or his answers under oath, had reason to believe, and did believe, the said invoices and statements to be correct, was a question for the jury under all the facts and circumstances of the case. Va. Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Hogue, 105 Va. 355, 54 S. E. 8. The modification made in the instruction was to submit that question to the jury, and, while it would have been better to have used the word "reasonable" before the word "grounds," we do not think that under the facts and circumstances disclosed by the record the defendant could have been prejudiced by the language of the court.

The remaining assignment of error to be considered is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence.

As we have seen, no error of law was made by the court to the prejudice of the defendant in submitting the case to the jury, and, as the evidence was conflicting upon all the material questions involved in the case, we are of opinion, without a detailed discussion of the evidence, that the court did not err in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury.

The judgment complained of must therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Russell County.
Suit by W. N. Howard and others against Joseph Howard and others to set aside a deed. From a decree for complainants, defendants appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

H. A. Routh and J. C. Gent, for appellants. Finney & Wilson, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. By deed dated January 21, 1909, Hiram Howard, since deceased, conveyed to the appellants Joseph Howard, Henry Howard, and Amanda Howard, several tracts of land lying adjacent to each other, containing in the aggregate about 165 acres, upon which the grantor resided, reserving to himself an estate in the land conveyed for and during the term of his natural life. The three grantees in this deed were the children of Hiram Howard by his second marriage; the last two named being under 21 years of age. The bill in this case was filed in the circuit court of Russell county by the appellees, six children of Hiram Howard by his first marriage, asking to have set aside the deed of January 21, 1909, to the appellants, upon the ground that the grantor was mentally incapable of making the deed, and upon the further ground that undue influence had been exerted over him. In response to the prayer of the bill, the circuit court set aside and annulled the deed in controversy, and from that decree this appeal has been taken.

It appears that Hiram Howard and all of his children lived upon the most cordial and amicable terms; the case being free from the bickerings usually found in such controversies. It further appears that Hiram Howard, though at the advanced age of 89 when he died, had lived an active and frugal life, nothing appearing of either mental or physical weakness until about 8 or 9 months before the deed in controversy was executed, when he was afflicted with "aphasia," involving some difficulty in his power of speech. It further appears that at the time of the execution of the deed the grantor was living at his home on the land in controversy, with his wife and her three children, the appellants, while the appellees, his six children by a former marriage, had more than 20 years before all married and left the home of their father, each having acquired an independence of greater value, to be inferred from the evidence, than that possessed by the father. On the other hand, the appellants, the three children by the second marriage, two of whom were under age and without education, were living at home, carrying on the work of the farm, and aiding in promoting the care and comfort of their father in his old age. In this situation and surroundings Hiram Howard made the deed of January 21, 1909, conveying his real estate to the appellants, reserving a life estate for himself.

[1] The general rule is well settled that all men are presumed to be of sound mind, the burden being upon him who alleges the contrary to establish such allegation. Burton v. Scott, 3 Rand. 399; Miller v. Rutledge, 82 Va. 867, 1 S. E. 202; Wallen v. Wallen, 107 Va. 131, 57 S. E. 596.

The evidence furnishes no ground for the contention that this case comes within the terms of an exception to the general rule, which casts upon the defendants the burden of showing that the grantor was mentally capable of making the deed in question. Under the facts of this case, to say that mental incapacity must be presumed until capability is proved would be to say that insanity is the natural state of the human mind. Burton v. Scott, supra, 3 Rand. 400.

[2, 3] The allegation that undue influence, causing him to make the deed, was exerted over the grantor is without any evidence to sustain it. Before undue influence can be made the ground for setting aside a deed or will, it must be sufficient to destroy free agency on the part of the person executing the instrument. It must amount to coercion—practically duress. It must be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the party had no free will, but stood in vinculis; and the burden in such a case, as in a case where fraud is charged, is always on him who charges undue influence. Jenkins v. Rhodes, 106 Va. 564, 56 S. E. 332; Hoover v. Neff, 107 Va. 441, 59 S. E. 428; Wood v. Wood, 109 Va. 470, 63 S. E. 994.

[4] The only fact pointed out in support of the charge of undue influence is that some years before the deed was made, when Hiram Howard was having his will prepared, his wife said to him that "she thought he ought to give her and the children all the land, that the land ought not to be divided between the first children." This remark did not influence her husband, for he proceeded to execute the contemplated will dividing his land between all of his children. The remark was not more than legitimate suggestion, which is permissible, and furnishes no warrant for the charge that undue influence was exerted.

[5] The evidence also fails to sustain the charge that Hiram Howard was mentally incapable of disposing of his land on the 21st day of January, 1909, when the deed in question was executed by him. A large number of witnesses were introduced on both sides of this issue, speaking of the mental capacity of the grantor both before and after the execution of the deed. None of appellees' witnesses saw the grantor the day the deed was executed, and practically all of them admit that they could not speak as to his mental condition at that time. This evidence is more than offset by the testimony of numerous friends and neighbors of the grantor, who show that he was capable of making the deed. This character of evidence is, however, always very unsatisfactory and inconclusive. It consists of mere opinions of witnesses who have in the most transient and casual way seen the person whose mental capacity is assailed, and whose conclusions with respect to the subject of inquiry rest upon no substantial basis.

[6] The testimony of witnesses who were present at the factum is more to be relied on than the opinion of other witnesses based on facts, which may be proved and yet not be the result of unsoundness of mind. Beverly v. Walden, 20 Grat. 147; Porter v. Porter, 89 Va. 118, 15 S. E. 500.

There were present on the occasion of the execution of the deed in this case six witnesses, including the justice who took the acknowledgment. They were intelligent friends and near neighbors of the grantor, who saw him frequently. They all speak of his mental condition when the deed was executed, and, after hearing and observing him with a view of ascertaining his mental condition, they all agree that he was of sound mind and capable of disposing of his property. The weight of this evidence has not been met or overcome by any other evidence in the record, and it must be accepted as establishing the fact that the grantor was mentally capable of making the deed in controversy at the time it was executed.

Criticism is made of the fact that these witnesses were summoned to be present at the factum by the appellants, without the solicitation or knowledge of the grantor. The unfavorable appearance sought to be drawn from this circumstance is answered by the fact, shown of record, that the witnesses were present at the suggestion and under the advice of the attorney who prepared the deed. The sequel shows the wisdom of that advice and the course pursued in response to it. In the case of Porter v. Porter, supra, one of the witnesses to the will voluntarily summoned several other witnesses to test the soundness of the mind of the testatrix, and we find no intimation in that case that such a course suggested any impropriety on the part of those who adopted it.

It is relied on as a suspicious circumstance by the appellees that the deed was not read to the grantor at the time of its execution. The evidence shows that the contents of the deed had been made known and explained to the grantor before it was executed, and the justice who took the acknowledgment and several of the other witnesses at the factum testify that it was suggested that the deed be read, when the grantor said that it was not necessary, that he understood its terms. It further appears that some days after the deed was executed it was read over to the grantor, and that he expressed his satisfaction with it, saying that he had fixed up his business now and was satisfied. This evidence as to the knowledge of Hiram Howard of the contents of the deed is undisputed. That it was, under such circumstances, unnecessary to read it at the time of its execution, is sustained by the case of Montague and Wife v. Allan's Ex'r, 78 Va. 592, 49 Am. Rep. 384, where it is held that to be satisfied that the testator knew the contents of the will when it was executed was all that was necessary.

In the year 1903 Hiram Howard made and executed a will by which he gave his lands to be equally divided between all of his children by his first and second marriages. After the testator's death this will was proven and admitted to record. Comment is made upon the fact that this will shows the purpose of the testator, when it was written, with respect to the division of his lands; and upon the further fact that it was not destroyed when the deed was made. That men may and constantly do change their minds with respect to the disposition of their property is a sufficient answer to the fact that Hiram Howard changed his between the years 1903 when the will was made and 1909 when the deed in controversy was executed. As a legal proposition, it was not necessary that the will should have been destroyed when the deed was made. That it was not destroyed is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that it disposes of the testator's personal property, which the deed does not do, and it was necessary to preserve the will to that end.

[7, 8] Stress is laid by appellees upon the great age of the grantor, as tending to sustain the allegation of mental incapacity. The law prescribes no limit in point of age beyond which a person cannot dispose of his property. A man 89 years of age is often as capable of making a deed or will as at any other period of his life. The greatness of his age is not proof of mental incapacity. Spencer v. Moore, 4 Call, 423. Nor is testamentary capacity destroyed by mere failure of memory incident to old age. Montague v. Allan's Ex'r, supra.

It is shown that Hiram Howard had been a strong man physically and mentally; that he had lived a careful and moral life; and that, apart from the ordinary infirmities of age, the only affliction he suffered with at the time the deed was made was one of a physical nature which did not affect his mind in any such way as to destroy his capacity to make the deed.

[8] The unequal disposition by the grantor of his land among his children is relied on as indicating mental incapacity. Courts cannot measure the size of people's capacities, nor examine into the wisdom and prudence of men in disposing of their property. If a man be legally compos mentis, be he wise or unwise, he is the disposer of his own property, and his will or deed stands as a reason for his actions. Greer v. Greer, 9 Grat. 330.

Hiram Howard was living at his home with his wife and his three children by her, two of whom were under age. They lived upon terms of reciprocal affection and confidence. This young family shared his toils and burdens, and did what they could to make the evening of the father's life one of peace and comfort. The six children by his first marriage had for many years been settled in homes of their own, and had prospered. The land disposed of by the deed is valued at from $7,000 to $8,000. Taking the highest valuation, it would give the nine children, if divided equally, $888.88 each. Divided among the three beneficiaries of the deed, each would have $2,666.66. The father had doubtless considered this question, and concluded that the small sum to each arising from an equal division would not justify him in leaving his wife and infant children helpless and without a home. Certainly, to many, the final disposition made by the grantor of his land would commend itself, not only as wise, but as a most natural and proper disposition under the circumstances. Be that as it may, it was his disposition, and cannot be disturbed.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the circuit court erred in setting aside and annulling the deed in controversy, dated January 21, 1909. The decree appealed from must, therefore, be reversed, and this court will enter such decree as the circuit court ought to have entered, dismissing the bill filed by the appellees, with costs in favor of the appellants.

Reversed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wythe County.

Suit by Pollie Harrell and another against D. H. Wampler. From a decree for complainants, defendant appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

El. Lee Trinkle and W. B. Kegley, for appellant. W. S. Poage, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. The controlling question in this case involves the mental capacity of Sallie Worrell and Pollie Harrell to make and execute a certain deed dated the 27th day of March, 1907, by which they conveyed their real estate to their nephew, D. H. Wampler, and of Sallie Worrell to make the will left by her when she died in July, 1907,

It appears that at the time of the transactions now called in question these two old people were living together, as they had done for many years prior thereto, upon a small tract of land containing in the aggregate 49 acres, situated about two miles from Rural Retreat, in the county of Wythe. Of this tract Pollie Harrell was the owner of 20 acres and Sallie Worrell the owner of the remaining 29 acres. They were sisters, and had both been married, but the husband of each was dead. Pollie Harrell had grandchildren, but Sallie Worrell was childless and without descendants. They were both over 75 years of age and feeble. They were of plain and simple habits of life, uneducated, and had spent practically all of their lives in the community where they resided at the time of the execution of the papers in controversy, very much alone, seeing and mixing with but few people. They made their living while they were able to perform their usual work by weaving, raising fowls, selling eggs and butter, and renting out their little farm to croppers. They did their own marketing, made their own trades with their croppers and others, looked after the division of the crops, and generally performed all of the labors about their home. A brother, George Wampler, owned a small tract of land adjoining their land, and had assisted them in looking after their affairs, doing work for them which they could not personally perform. These modest surroundings and this uneventful simple life constituted the daily routine of these two feeble old people, whose mental capacity is the subject of this inquiry.

It appears that prior to March 27, 1907, when the deed under consideration was executed, these two old people, with a view of aiding two of their nephews, sons of their brother George Wampler, in the purchase of a threshing machine, became their indorsers for $1,875, and gave a deed of trust on their little farm to secure that sum. This enterprise of the nephews proved a failure, and resulted in leaving an unpaid balance of about $1,000, secured by deed of trust on the farm, without any other source of payment but these women. This heavy incumbrance coming in their old age and enfeebled condition was naturally a great source of anxiety and trouble to them, leaving them in constant fear of having their home sold to satisfy the debt. On March 24, 1907, three days before the deed in question was executed, George Wampler, the brother to whom they had looked for assistance, died, thus increasing their anxiety and helpless condition. At this time their nephew, D. H. Wampler, the appellant, who lived about 68 miles distant, in the state of Tennessee, and who had come to attend his uncle's funeral, was at the home of his old aunts paying them a visit. This nephew had spent a considerable part of his early life with these aunts, and had visited them after settling elsewhere. It was while on this visit that the deed of March 27, 1907, was made and executed by the aunts conveying to D. H. Wampler their land upon the terms and conditions therein set forth. Those terms were that the nephew should, in consideration of the 49 acres of land, pay all liens and debts to which the land was subject, and should maintain and support the two grantors and their sister, Ann Wampler Miller, during their lifetime. The deed provides that as a further consideration for the land conveyed the grantor should pay to the grandchildren of Pollie Harrell whatever was left of her part of the property after considering her support and deducting her part of the liens and debts binding the whole land. Provision is made for the appointment of a disinterested committee of three persons to value the land of Pollie Harrell as a basis for the settlement with her grandchildren. This committee was selected by the grantors, and at their instance made a prompt report, estimating the value of Pollie Harrell's 20 acres at $40 per acre. This report was attached to the deed as a part thereof before it was recorded, the three members of the committee who made and signed it acknowledging the same before the notary who was present at the execution of the deed. The members of this commission are shown to be men of fine judgment and the highest standing.

After this deed was made and recorded, and before July 12, 1907, Sallie Worrell made and executed a will by which she gave to her nephew, D. H. Wampler, the appellant, her personal property, providing that the legatee should pay her sister, Ann Wampler, $25 and her nephew, G. W. Wampler, $10, within six months of the time of her death. Soon after this will was executed Sallie Worrell died, and it was duly proven and admitted to record on July 12, 1907. The death of Sallie Worrell within a few months after the execution of the deed in controversy seems to have made the impression upon Pollie Harrell and Ann Wampler Miller that the appellant had gained some advantage under the deed. This idea, the record very clearly indicates, was instigated by the sister, Ann Wampler Miller, who was secured a support for life under the deed. She is shown to be a very turbulent spirit, and her dissatisfaction and agitation continued until the bill in this case was filed by herself and Pollie Harrell, one of the grantors in the deed, seeking to annul the same, and also to have declared null and void the will left by Sallie Worrell, upon the ground that she and her deceased sister were both of unsound mind, and therefore incapable of making either a deed or a will.

[1] There is no direct evidence adduced to sustain the charge that undue influence was exerted over these aunts by their nephew, the appellant, nor are there any circumstances tending to support the charge. On the contrary, the execution of both the deed and the will appears to have been wholly voluntary acts on their part, uninfluenced by suggestion from any quarter. The record furnishes a sufficient reason moving the grantors to make the deed of March 27, 1907. They were old and feeble, and were in urgent need of some one competent to manage their affairs and look after their comfort. Their brother, George Wampler, upon whom they had depended for help, had just died, and they had no near relative in the community in whom they could place confidence. In this dilemma their nephew, the appellant, who had lived with and been nurtured by them, and for whom they must have felt some affection, appeared in their home, and they at once turned to him for the help they so much needed at that time, and determined through him to make certain provision for their support during their remaining years.

[2] The appellees seek to inject into this case, as evidence, the record of a suit brought some years before by Sallie Worrell, which they claim involved her mental capacity. The transactions involved in that suit have no bearing upon the case at bar, and cannot be looked to for any purpose. The appellant was not a party to that suit, and is in no way bound by the proceedings therein or its results. The present cause must be decided upon its own merits, and not upon the results of a long-past litigation, the record of which the appellant had never seen.

In this case, as in most cases of its kind, an array of witnesses have been introduced for and against the competency of these old people to make and execute the instruments involved in this controversy. The preponderance of this evidence is, we think, in favor of their competency. Such evidence is, however, at best, very unsatisfactory, and furnishes a very inadequate basis for a reliable conclusion. It consists largely of opinions of persons having little acquaintance with those whose mental capacity is questioned, the conclusions reached having no substantial basis for support in either fact or reason. [3] Hence it is that the testimony of those who were present at the factum is chiefly regarded, and held to be more reliable than the opinion of other witnesses based on facts which may be proved, and yet not be the result of unsoundness of mind. Beverly v. Walden, 20 Grat. 147; Howard v. Howard, 72 S. E. 133, decided at the present term of this court.

In this case there were present at the execution of the deed of March 27, 1907, besides the grantor and grantee, three witnesses: Dr. W. W. Buck, who had been up to his retirement from practice for years the family physician of these people, and had known them well practically all of his life; James F. Huddle, a farmer living within a mile of the grantors, who had known them well for more than forty years; and El M. Davis, cashier of a bank at Rural Retreat, and the notary who took the acknowledgment to the deed, who had known the grantors for many years.

The witnesses to the will of Sallie Worrell were Dr. Buck and Dr. E. W. Peary, who succeeded Dr. Buck as the family physician of these old people after the retirement of the former from practice. The evidence is full as to the intelligence, integrity, and high standing of these witnesses in the community. They were entirely disinterested, and express the emphatic and unqualified opinion that Pollie Harrell and Sallie Worrell were of sound mind and entirely capable of making both the deed and the will now in controversy. Dr. Buck prepared both the deed and the will, and says that the entire terms of each were fully discussed by Pollie Harrell and Sallie Worrell and recorded in accordance with their directions, free from the suggestion or influence of any one. It further appears from this evidence that before these papers were signed they were again carefully read over and fully explained to these parties, who stated in each case that it was all right, and what they wanted to do. These witnesses do not claim that these old people were possessed of any unusual intelligence, but their evidence is full and clear that they were capable of understanding, and that they did fully comprehend the nature of both these transactions, which were their free and voluntary acts, uninfluenced by any suggestion or persuasion from outside sources.

[4, 5] No particular degree of mental acumen is to be prescribed as the measure of one's capacity to execute deeds or wills. The test is whether the party had at the time of the execution of the instrument sufficient mental capacity to understand the nature of the transaction he was entering into, and to assent to its provisions. Greer v. Greer, 9 Grat. 330; Beverly v. Walden, supra.

[6, 7] Measured by this test, the mental capacity of Pollie Harrell and Sallie Worrell is shown to have been fully equal to making and executing the deed and will involved in this controversy.

[8] It is contended on behalf of the appellees that the consideration for the deed in question is so grossly inadequate as to show fraud in its procurement. This contention is wholly without merit. The deed shows on its face ample consideration. It shows that Pollie Harrell, who is now uniting in this attack upon her own mental capacity and that of her deceased sister, received every dollar her property was worth at the time, the value being ascertained in the manner suggested and insisted upon by her, which was a usual and proper method of arriving at such value. The witnesses introduced by both parties are practically united in the opinion that the consideration for the deed was ample, most of them saying that appellant had assumed more than they would have been willing to do for the same consideration.

[9] It is further contended on behalf of appellees that appellant has failed to perform the obligations assumed by him under the deed. This is a mere recital in the bill, and does not appear to be a ground relied on for setting aside the deed. So far from basing their complaint upon the failure of appellant to comply with his covenants, they show that they did not wish him to comply or to be permitted to comply, since they pray for an injunction to restrain appellant from entering upon or taking possession of the land, thus showing their purpose to put it beyond his power to comply. This contention is, however, not sustained by the record. On the contrary, it satisfactorily appears that appellant has done all that he could reasonably be expected to do in compliance with his contract. He arranged for the cultivation of their land, for having firewood hauled and cut, and for furnishing flour and other necessaries. He furnished them with a cow to provide them with milk and butter, furnished fertilizer for the farm, had the necessary fencing on the place done, and arranged with the tenant to turn over to them all that was raised on the place for their support and maintenance. He arranged with physicians to give them such medical attention as they should need, and for his notification should his presence be needed. He sent his daughter to live with them and to look after their personal comfort, who remained with them until the pestiferous Ann Miller made conditions so disagreeable that she could no longer stay. In the last illness of Sallie Worrell appellant came with his wife, spending some weeks in the home, and gave to his aunt the personal attention that she needed, and, when she died, gave her decent burial and paid her funeral expenses. Since the death of Sallie Worrell, through the misguided feeling and violence of Ann Miller, appellant has been forced to keep away from the home, and has been unable to render them any personal service, either by himself or by members of his family. He has, however, continued, through the tenant employed by him, to furnish them their support. He has sent them money at different times, through other parties, which sums they, under advice of counsel, refused to accept. It further appears that appellant has received nothing from the use of the place; on the contrary, it has been an expense to him ever since the deed was made. It is true that appellant has not paid off the mortgage on the place, and he was wise not to do so pending this litigation. He was so advised by his attorney, and he made an arrangement with the creditor not to press the collection until after this suit was determined. This arrangement has been fully carried out, and appellees have suffered no inconvenience therefrom.

If failure to perform covenants were ground for setting aside the deed, as to which we express no opinion, the evidence and circumstances disclosed by this record wholly fail to sustain the contention that appellant has not complied with his contract.

For these reasons, the court is of opinion that the decree of the circuit court declaring null and void the deed of March 27, 1907, and the will of Sallie Worrell, probated July 12, 1907, is erroneous, and must therefore be reversed; and this court will enter such decree as the circuit court ought to have entered, dismissing the bill filed by the appellees, with costs in favor of the appellant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County. Suit by T. M. Dobyns and another against J. Howe Kent and others. From a decree in part for complainants, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jno. S. Draper and Jos. C. Wysor, for appellants. W. B. Kegley and E. Lee Trinkle, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. This appeal is from a decree perpetually enjoining the appellants from using a roadway from J. Howe Kent's residence through the farm of appellees to the Giles turnpike. The bill, moreover, prays that the defendants be restrained from the use of another road from J. Howe Kent's to what is known as the mountain land, extending in part over the plaintiff's property.

With respect to the latter route, the court adjudged the appellants, J. Howe Kent, Mrs. E. K. Hudson, and Mrs. Ellen G. Bell, entitled to the right of way, and denied the injunction, and that ruling is made the ground of cross-error by the appellees.

The appellants assert title to a private road to the Giles turnpike by prescription, by adjudication of a court of competent jurisdiction, and by estoppel.

The general principles of law applicable to this class of easements are well settled, and have received careful consideration by this court. For such easement to arise by prescription the user must be with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner. It must be adverse, continuous, and uninterrupted for at least 20 years, and along a definite line of travel. It will not arise simply from permission of the owner, for it has been repeatedly held that the use of land of another for any length of time merely by permission will not ripen into title. [1] Nor must the use of the way be in common with other people. It is not essential, however, in order to satisfy the latter principle, that the claimant shall be the only one to enjoy the right of way, since other persons may likewise acquire a prescriptive right to use it. Nevertheless, claimant's right must be exclusive in the sense that it does not depend for its enjoyment upon similar rights in others. 14 Cyc. 1145, et seq.

[2] In Reid v. Garnett, 101 Va. 47, 48, 43 S. E. 182, Judge Buchanan summarizes the law on the subject as follows: "In order to establish a private right of way by prescription over the lands of another, the use and enjoyment thereof by the claimant must be shown to be adverse, under a claim of right, exclusive, continuous, uninterrupted, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner of the land over which it is claimed (Gaines v. Merryman, 95 Va. 660, 666, 29 S. E. 738; Washb. Easem. [3d Ed.] side p. 86); and such use and enjoyment must continue for a period of at least 20 years (Cornett v. Rhudy, 80 Va. 710)."

To the same effect is the more recent case of Williams v. Green, 111 Va. 205, 88 S. E. 253.

Tested by these well-settled criteria, the evidence, so far from being sufficient to establish a private right of way in the appellants, plainly shows that its use was by permission of Joseph Cloyd, the former owner, and was not exclusive in its character. They neither claimed nor possessed the exclusive right to use the road, but enjoyed it in common with any one else who chose to travel it. The record also discloses that the Cloyds and Kents owned large boundaries of contiguous lands. For generations the two families had been allied by ties of consanguinity, affinity, and friendship; and the permissive use of the roadway in question was the result of those relations, and in no sense founded on adverse claim.

The remaining contentions (namely, that appellants are entitled to the right of way by adjudication of a court of competent jurisdiction and by estoppel) both rest upon an order of the circuit court of Pulaski county on appeal from an order of the county court denying the application of Joseph G. Kent (the father of J. Howe Kent) to establish the road in dispute as a public road. The order reads as follows:

"Jos. G. Kent, Appellant, v. Joseph Cloyd, Appellee.

"Upon appeal from an order of the county court of Pulaski county refusing to establish a public road.

"The court having heard and maturely considered the evidence in this cause, and it appearing that the appellant has a sufficient and convenient road over the same location proposed for a public road applied for, and the appellee Joseph Cloyd, over whose land the road now passes, being examined as a witness, having declared that he had given permission to the said Kent and all others interested in said road to use the same at any and all times, and that he had no intention to revoke that permission, the court is of opinion that there is no error in the order of the county court, and affirms the same with costs to the appellee."

[3] It thus affirmatively appears from the order that Kent was using the road by permission of Cloyd, and not by virtue of any title or claim of title in himself, and this permissive use was the basis of the court's refusal to open a public road. If the appellant was not satisfied with the result of the litigation and the limitations placed upon his rights by the order, his remedy was by appeal. There was certainly nothing in the declaration of Joseph Cloyd, as incorporated in the order, to operate an estoppel. It was a frank, open avowal of the rights of himself and Joseph G. Kent with respect to the road, and was in no way calculated to mislead the latter or otherwise to injuriously affect his rights. The parties stood in the relation of licensor and licensee towards each other, and the statement that Cloyd had no intention to revoke the permission (a declaration which he kept in good faith during his lifetime) in no way affected the rights or changed the relations of the parties. [4] The license remained a license, and was revocable at the pleasure of the licensor. 2 Min. Inst. (3d Ed.) 27, 28; Bigelow on Estoppel (4th Ed.) 557; 25 Cyc. 645.

Upon the second branch of the case, as we have seen, the circuit court decreed that J. Howe Kent, Mrs. E. K. Hudson, and Mrs. Ellen G. Bell, children of Joseph G. Kent, were entitled to a right of way over the 300-acre tract of land sold by Baskerville, trustee and commissioner, to Joseph Cloyd. This was an ancient roadway, passing originally wholly through the lands of Joseph G. Kent, and connecting his residence with the mountain land. When the intervening 300-acre tract was offered for sale at public auction, the auctioneer announced that the private right of way was reserved, and the land was sold and purchased subject to that reservation.

[5] In 1 Minor on Real Property, § 136, the author, in discussing the revocation of licenses, observes: "It seems, however, to be admitted that if the transaction be one which, if it were under seal, would create an easement, it being classed as a license merely because it is oral, upon a part performance thereof by the licensee by the expenditure of money or otherwise, a court of equity may regard it as an equitable easement, and therefore irrevocable."

This proposition is in accordance with the authorities cited in the notes, and sustains the decision of the learned circuit court.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the decree appealed from is without error, and it must be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Sept. 14, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1019*) — REVIEW — REPORT OF REFEREE.

The report of a commissioner appointed in receivership proceedings is prima facie correct, and an order confirming it will not be reversed if the evidence is conflicting, unless the commissioner's finding is clearly erroneous.

2. RECEIVERS (§ 203*) — STATEMENT OF ACCOUNT—REFERENCE.

Where a commissioner appointed to take a receiver's account reported that he charged the receiver with all sums received and credited him with all expenditures made by him, and it does not appear that the account could have been itemized and stated in detail, as directed by the decree ordering the account, or that a recommitment would be beneficial, the report was properly confirmed, though it did not state the receiver's account in detail.

3. RECEIVERS (§ 193*)—ACCOUNTING—CREDITS.

Upon the accounting of a receiver for the purchaser of lumber, who had become insolvent, the receiver should be credited with the amount of a rebate made for lumber sold by him under a guaranteed inspection, necessitated by a shortage in the lumber sold; the inspection having been made by the receiver's agent.

4. RECEIVERS (§ 192*)—ACCOUNTING—COST OF SETTLING.

A receiver did not make any account until a rule to show cause why he had not done so, in answer to which he filed a statement showing a much less balance in his hands than was due from him, whereupon the court ordered a reference to have a correct account made. Held, that the receiver should be charged personally with the expense of taking the account, crediting him with the amount paid for the commissioner's statement; the fund in his hands being chargeable only with the reasonable expense for stating the receiver's account, in answer to the rule to show cause.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Russell County.

Suit by C. T. Howard, administrator, against W. H. Gose and others. From a decree confirming the commissioner's report in receivership accounting proceedings, complainant appeals. Amended and affirmed.

W. W. Bird, for appellant. Routh & Routh and S. B. Quillen, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. The errors assigned in the petition for appeal are based upon the action of the court in passing upon exceptions to a commissioner's report, settling the accounts of J. E. Duff, as receiver in the cause.

In the year 1905, Jack Carter entered into an agreement with W. H. Gose and J. J. Campbell, by which he sold them a certain boundary of timber for the sum of $3,000. Of this sum $1,000 was paid in cash, and the residue was to be paid in 18 months from the date of the contract. A lien was reserved upon the timber to secure the payment of the deferred purchase price. The vendees were to have two years within which to remove the timber from the land. After removing the larger and more valuable part of it, the purchasers became insolvent and unable to complete their contract. The rights of the vendor being endangered by litigation by other creditors, he, in July, 1906, brought this suit, by which the vendees were enjoined from further disposition of the timber or unsold lumber manufactured therefrom, and by consent of parties the said Duff was appointed receiver and directed "to take charge of the tan bark, manufactured lumber and fallen logs mentioned in the bill, and make the best available sale he can of such properties as are ready for market, and * * * to proceed to manufacture all unmanufactured logs and timber mentioned and described in the contract between the complainant, Jack Carter, and W. H. Gose and J. J. Campbell as speedily as possible and make sale of the same to the best advantage of all parties in interest."

At the July term, 1907, the receiver not having made any report of his action, upon motion of the complainant a rule was awarded against him to show cause why he had not made and filed a report of his doings as receiver, returnable to the next term of the court. Before the November term of the court following, the defendant Gose had died, and at that term an order to revive the cause in the name of his personal representative was made. In February, 1908, the receiver filed a settlement of his accounts, made by the commissioner of accounts of the court. This report was excepted to by the complainant; but without passing upon the exceptions the court, upon motion of the complainant, directed one of its commissioners to cause the receiver to come before him and make a full and complete settlement of his receivership accounts.

Upon the coming in of that report, the complainant filed 12 exceptions and the receiver 4, all of which, except the complainant's exception numbered 11 and the receiver's exceptions numbered 1, 3, and 4, were overruled, and a decree entered, amending and confirming the commissioner's report. From that decree this appeal was taken by the complainant's personal representative.

The appellant insists that the court erred in not sustaining each and all of his exceptions to the commissioner's report, and in not overruling all the exceptions of the receiver.

[1] The appellant's exceptions to the commissioner's report, numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 9, are upon matters of fact found by the commissioner. The evidence upon those matters is conflicting. While this court will, upon such matters, where the evidence is returned with the report, review and weigh the evidence, and if not satisfied that the commissioner has reached a right conclusion overrule his finding or findings, yet, except as to errors apparent on its face, the report is prima facie correct, and where the evidence is conflicting this court will not reverse the action of the trial court overruling an exception to the report and confirming it, unless the finding of the commissioner is clearly erroneous. Hall v. Hall, 104 Va. 773, 775, 776, 52 S. E. 557, and cases cited.

After a full examination of the evidence upon the matters involved in the said exceptions, we cannot say the findings of the commissioner, approved and sustained by the trial court, upon the questions involved in the said exceptions, are clearly erroneous.

[2] Appellant's exception numbered 1 is that the account of the receiver, as stated by the commissioner, is not itemized and stated in detail, as directed by the decree ordering the account.

The commissioner did not state the account by items and in detail, as directed, but he says in his report that it was impossible for him to so state it, from all the evidence before him, including the receiver's books, invoices, and statements filed. He reports that he charged the receiver with all sums or amounts which the evidence showed he had received as receiver, and credited him with all expenditures in the performance of his duties which the evidence showed he was entitled to. It does not appear that a more detailed statement of the account could have been made, or that anything could have been gained by recommitting the report. We are therefore of opinion that exception No. 1 was properly overruled by the trial court.

Exception No. 6 to the commissioner's report was because the commissioner had credited the receiver with $70 a month for five months and $35 a month for seven months, paid to C. L. Fletcher, whom he had employed as foreman to aid him in the performance of his duties as receiver.

By the terms of the decree appointing the receiver, he was authorized to employ such labor as was necessary to carry out the directions of the court in manufacturing and disposing of the timber and lumber, etc., which came to his hands as receiver. It appears that the services rendered by Mr. Fletcher were necessary, and that the compensation paid him therefor was not more than his services were reasonably worth.

[3] The court is further of opinion that the trial court properly sustained exception No. 1 of the appellee to the commissioner's report, and allowed him an additional credit for $161.68 on account of rebate for lumber sold the Clinch Valley Lumber Company upon a guaranteed inspection. The evidence shows that on inspecting the lumber Mr. Fletcher was the agent of the receiver, and not the agent of the lumber company, and that upon inspection by that company there was a shortage and rebate to that extent. Not to credit the receiver with that sum would be to charge him with money which he was not entitled to and did not receive.

Exception No. 8 to the commissioner's report is that the commissioner failed "to report the profits realized by the Clinch Valley Lumber Company on lumber sold by the receiver to it, as called for by the complainant, the said receiver being president of and a large stockholder in the Clinch Valley Lumber Company, to which he sold the greater part of said lumber."

A large part of the lumber was sold to the Clinch Valley Lumber Company, of which he was president and in which he was a stockholder; but the evidence shows that that company paid as much for the lumber as any one else would pay, and that Mr. Fletcher was authorized by the receiver to sell the lumber to any one else who would pay more for it. The receiver testifies that the lumber was handled through his company as a matter of convenience, and because in that way he was able to realize more for it than he could otherwise have done, and that he does not think that his company realized any profit upon its purchases beyond the necessary expense of shipping and handling it. It does not appear from the evidence that the Clinch Valley Lumber Company made a profit upon the lumber sold it, and the evidence tends to show that the appellant was benefited, rather than prejudiced, by such sales. Under the facts disclosed by the record, the trial court properly overruled that exception (No. 8) to the commissioner's report.

Exception No. 10 is because the "commissioner fails to charge the receiver with 142 logs containing 25,000 feet of merchantable lumber, left by the receiver in the woods unmanufactured and now spoiled and wasted."

It appears that the logs in question were scattered over the boundary of timber land—some 300 acres. The evidence is conflicting as to the quantity of lumber the logs would have made, their quality or condition, the difficulty of getting them to a sawmill on account of their location, and whether or not it would have cost more to have manufactured and marketed them than they were worth. The commissioner, upon all the evidence, did not think that the receiver should be charged with anything on account of these logs, and we cannot say that the trial court erred in approving his finding.

The appellant's assignment of error, based upon his exception No. 12, and cross-error assigned by appellee, based on his exception No. 4, may be considered together, as they both involve the question as to who should pay the costs of settling the receiver's account.

[4] The receiver failed to make any report of his doings to the court until a rule was awarded against him to show cause why he had not done so. When, in answer to that rule, he did file a statement of his account, it was inaccurate, and showed a much less balance in his hands than was really due from him. If the receiver had kept an accurate and itemized account of his transactions as receiver, as he ought to have done, he could have made an accurate statement of his account in answer to the rule to show cause, and thus have rendered unnecessary the reference ordered by the court and the costs attending it. The court is therefore of opinion that no part of the costs or expenses attending the taking of the account ordered by the court should be charged to the complainant or the fund in the hands of the receiver, except what would have been a reasonable charge for stating his account in answer to the rule to show cause. The commissioner of accounts having charged him $9.75 for making that statement, the court is of opinion that the receiver should be credited with that sum ($9.75) on his account as receiver, and be charged personally with the costs and expense attending the taking of the account ordered by the court.

The appellee assigns as cross-error the action of the court overruling his exception No. 2, filed to the commissioner's report, for refusing to allow him the sum of $127.68 as interest on money advanced by him in performing his duties as receiver. The commissioner reported that he did not allow that item of interest, because the evidence did not show that he had really made such advances as entitled him to the interest claimed. The refusal of the commissioner was approved by the trial court, and properly so, as it seems to us.

[6] The court is further of opinion that the trial court properly allowed the receiver compensation for his services. While he did not keep his accounts as carefully as he might have done, there is nothing in the record to show that he did not act with good faith in the performance of his duties and manage the trust with reasonable success. The amount allowed, 5 per cent. upon the fund which passed through his hands, was the usual, and we think a reasonable, allowance for his services, and the trial court properly so held.

The court is further of opinion that there was no error to the prejudice of the appellee in decreeing interest upon the balance found in the hands of the receiver from the 23d of February, 1909.

It follows from what has been said that there is no error in the decree appealed from, except in the matter of costs in taking and settling the account ordered by the court. Instead of crediting the receiver with $75 on that account, the court ought only to have credited him with $9.75 and rendered a personal decree against him for the residue. The decree will be amended in that respect, and as amended affirmed, with costs to the appellee as the party substantially prevailing.

Amended and affirmed.

Longley & Jordan and J. C. Wysor, for appellants. Johnson & Roop, H. C. Tyler, Woods, Jackson & Smith, R. E. Byrd, and Scott, Buchannan & Cardwell, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. Upon the application of eight citizens and taxpayers of the city of Radford an injunction was awarded in this case, enjoining and restraining the board of trustees of the Radford Normal School from entering into a contract for the purchase of certain property within the city of Radford, known as the "Heth property," as a site for such school, and enjoining and restraining the finance committee of the city council of Radford from paying for such site, upon the ground that the act creating the Radford Normal School makes the selection of the "Adams site," mentioned therein, obligatory, and leaves the board of trustees appointed under the act without discretion as to the physical location of the school, and upon the further ground that the board was an illegal body, without lawful existence or power to act until their appointment by the Governor had been ratified by the Senate of Virginia.

The act creating the Radford Normal School does not, as contended by appellants, confine the board of trustees to the Adams site as a location for the school establishment; on the contrary, under the facts disclosed by the record, we are of opinion that the board had the power to select, in its discretion, a site within the corporate limits of the city of Radford.

The controlling question, however, raised by the record, involves the right of appellants to come into a court of equity for the purposes of this suit.

[1] It clearly appears from the record that the appellants have no such interest in the location of this school in the city of Radford as gives them the right to invoke the aid of a court of equity in their effort to determine that location. Citizens can sue in equity to restrain a municipal corporation from creating an unauthorized debt or illegally expending the money of the municipality. Lynchburg & R. St. Ry. Co. v. Dameron, 95 Va. 545, 28 S. E. 951; Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214. This principle, however, has no application to the present case, in which no unauthorized debt has been created by the city and no illegal expenditure of its money is contemplated. The record shows that the city must pay $20,000 for either of the sites mentioned. It can, therefore, make no difference to the appellants, as taxpayers, which site is selected. The burden of taxation upon them will be the same in either case. It is clear that appellants have no interest in the selection of the site for this school differing from that of the general public, nor have they or the citizens generally the right to require the selection of the Adams site. The Radford Normal School, when established, will be in no sense a municipal institution of the city of Radford. It is purely a state institution, administered for the benefit of the whole state by one of its own instrumentalities, a board of trustees, which is given full power and authority to determine the location of the school within the corporate limits of the city of Radford.

[2] Not only have the appellants no interest which permits them to ask for relief in equity in the matter of selecting a site for this normal school, but their attack upon the title of the trustees, as such, is unavailing as a ground for maintaining this proceeding to enjoin and restrain the trustees from discharging their public duties.

The law upon this subject is well settled, and is sufficiently stated in High on Injunctions (4th Ed.) § 1312, where the learned author says: "No principle of the law of injunctions, and perhaps no doctrine of equity jurisprudence, is more definitely fixed or more clearly established than that courts of equity will not interfere by injunction to determine questions concerning the appointment or election of public officers or their title to office; such questions being of a purely legal nature, and cognizable only by courts of law. A court of equity will not permit itself to be made the forum for determining disputed questions of title to public offices. * * * Thus equity will not interfere by injunction to restrain persons from exercising the functions of public offices on the ground of the illegality of the law under which these appointments were made, but will leave that question to be determined by a legal forum."

We are of opinion that the decree appealed from, dissolving the injunction awarded in this cause and dismissing the bill filed by the appellants, is plainly right and must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

McCLARY v. ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION et al.†

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 2, 1911.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—TIMBER DEED—CONSTRUCTION.

A deed to the timber on certain land, after conveying title thereto with certain easements, provided that the grantee, its successors or assigns should have 10 years beginning from the time when they should begin cutting and removing the timber, in which to cut and remove the same, and that, in case it was not cut and removed before the expiration of that period, they should have such further time as they might desire, but in that event should pay interest on the original purchase price annually. Held, that such deed, though a valid conveyance of the fee, passed a qualified or determinable fee only; the grantee and assigns being required to commence the removal of the timber within a reasonable time, as viewed by the parties when the contract was signed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 173*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—VACATION.

Where, in a suit to set aside a timber deed, complainant prayed and obtained a temporary injunction restraining defendant from cutting timber pendente lite, and such injunction was essential to the assertion and preservation of plaintiff's legal right, if established as alleged in the complaint, it was error for the court to set aside such injunction on insufficient counter affidavits.

RUCKER, A. A. J. This is an action against the defendant above named, commenced by service, respectively, on February 7, 1911, and February 17, 1911, upon the defendants. The object of the complaint was to have declared null and void a certain lumber deed, which in terms was as follows:

"State of South Carolina, County of Williamsburg.

"This deed and contract, made by and between S. M. McClary, of the county of Williamsburg and state of South Carolina, party of the first part, hereinafter called the first party, and the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Virginia, the principal office of which is in the city of Norfolk in said state, party of the second part, hereinafter called the second party, witnesseth: That the said first party, for and in consideration of the sum of two hundred dollars ($200.00) cash in hand paid by the said second party to the said first party, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, sold and released, and by these presents does grant, bargain, sell and release unto the said second party, its successors or assigns, all the timber of every kind and description, both standing and fallen, of twelve (12) inches stump diameter and upwards twelve inches from the ground at the time of cutting on all that certain pieces, parcel or tract of land known as _____, situated in Sumter township in the county of _____ and state of South Carolina, containing two hundred and seventy-five (275) acres, more or less, and bounded and described as follows, to wit: On the north by the public road leading from Kingstree to Mayesville and lands of W. V. Brockington; on the east by lands of Robertson and Taylor; on the south by Black river, and on the west by lands of W. V. Brockington, exception being made to the following described timber, which is not conveyed in this deed, to wit: All other timber except the pine, the intention being to convey nothing but the pine timber situated on the above described premises. And the said first party further reserves the right to use any timber from the aforesaid tract or tracts of land for ordinary plantation purposes connected with the said land, this reservation, however, not to include the right to clear the said land of any of it.

"This deed further witnesseth: That the party of the first part does hereby also grant, bargain, sell and convey to the party of the second part, its successors or assigns, a permanent and exclusive right of way eighty (80) feet wide upon and across the tract or tracts of land described as aforesaid, and on all contiguous lands, to be selected and located by the said second party, its successors and assigns, whenever and wherever so desired, to be used for a permanent railroad or tramway, or for any permanent branch railroad or tramway, together with the following exclusive rights and privileges, to be exercised at any and all times during the continuance of this contract, at the pleasure of the said second party, its successors or assigns, namely, to enter freely upon the said above described tract or tracts of land, to have and enjoy all necessary and convenient rights of way, to be located by the said second party, its successors or assigns, over said lands and contiguous lands, for ingress or egress, at any and all times, for men, teams and vehicles; to cut and make roads over said lands; to build, construct, maintain and operate railroads, tramways, cart and wagon ways across said lands on such routes as may be selected by the said second party, its successors or assigns; to establish and maintain stables and other fixtures or buildings on the said lands; and to do any and all other things that may be necessary or convenient for the cutting, handling, hauling and removing of the timber, as aforesaid, from the above described tract or tracts of land, and for the transportation of any other timber and articles of every kind and description that the second party may desire to transport over the said roads or any of them, with the right to cut and use all such small timber and brush as may, in the judgment of the second party, its successors or assigns, be required to build, construct and maintain the aforesaid railroad, tramways, cart and wagon ways, roadways and buildings, fixtures and structures, during the continuance of this contract, for the removal of timber hereinbefore conveyed; and together also with the right of the second party, its successors or assigns, to remove at its or their pleasure, at any time during this contract, or at or after its termination, all rails, buildings, structures, fixtures and other property it or they may have placed on said land.

"To have and to hold all and singular the aforesaid timber situate on aforesaid tract or tracts of land, except that above reserved, unto the said party of the second part, its successors or assigns, and to have and to hold the aforesaid permanent and exclusive rights of way unto the said second party, its successors or assigns forever. And the said first party for himself or themselves, and for his or their heirs, executors and administrators, do covenant with the said second party, its successors or assigns, as follows:

"First. That the said first party will warrant and forever defend all and singular the title to the timber upon the aforesaid premises, and also the title to said permanent and other rights of way, and other rights and privileges hereby granted, unto the said second party, its successors or assigns, against himself, his heirs and all other lawfully or otherwise claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof.

"Second. That the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall have, and the same is hereby granted to it or them, the period of ten (10) years, beginning from the time that the said second party, its successors or assigns, begins the cutting and removing of the aforesaid timber from the tract or tracts of land above described, in which to cut and remove the said timber from the said lands; and that in case the said timber is not cut and removed before the expiration of said period, then that the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall have such additional time therefor as it may desire, but, in the last mentioned event the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall during the extended period pay interest on the original purchase price above mentioned, year by year in advance at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum.

"Third. The said first party further agrees that the timber cut by the said second party, its successors or assigns, for the purpose of opening, clearing, building and constructing of the railroads, tramways, etc., as hereinbefore provided for, shall in no way whatsoever affect the time granted for the cutting and removing the timber conveyed under this deed from the tract or tracts of land aforesaid.

"Fourth. That the first party shall and will promptly pay all taxes that are now due or that hereafter may become due on the said land and timber. The said second party, for itself, its successors or assigns, covenants with the said first party, his heirs, administrators and assigns, that the said second party, its successors and assigns, shall and will promptly pay all damage done to growing crops in the selection and location of the rights of way above provided for; also any damage that may accrue to the said party by reason of any negligence on the part of the agents and employees of the second party, its successors and assigns, during the continuance of this contract, said damage to be assessed and ascertained by two disinterested persons, one to be chosen by each of the parties to this contract, and in case they disagree, the two so chosen to select a third, and the decision of any two of the persons so selected shall be made in writing and shall be final and binding upon all the parties hereto.

"All the covenants, stipulations and agreements herein assumed or undertaken by either party to this contract shall be binding upon their respective heirs, executors, administrators, successors or assigns, and all benefits and advantages herein provided for either of said parties shall accrue to their respective heirs, executors, administrators, successors or assigns, as the case may be.

"Witness our hands and seals this 18th day of August, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-nine (1899). S. M. McClary. [L. S.] Atlantic Coast Lumber Company, [L. S.] by R. L. Montague, Secretary. [L. S.]

"Signed, sealed and delivered in presence of S. McB. Scott. H. G. Askin. L. M. Overton. H. K. Weaver."

This contract was signed by the plaintiff and the defendant, Atlantic Coast Lumber Company, on the 18th day of August, 1899. The complaint attacks the deed upon the following grounds, as being against public policy, in that it requires the grantor to pay taxes for an indefinite period on the timber conveyed, and also for indefiniteness and uncertainty, in that no fixed or certain time was therein provided for the commencement of the cutting and removing of the timber thereby conveyed, and also asking that the said deed and contract should be construed as requiring the grantee and its assigns to commence the cutting and removal of the said timber within a reasonable time, and that the said time should be decreed to have elapsed and expired prior to the entry of the defendant, Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation (which is the successor of the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company), and that the defendant should be adjudged to have forfeited and lost all right under the said deed by reason of the expiration of a reasonable time, and that the said deed be ordered canceled.

There was a further allegation in the complaint for the sum of $2,500 damages caused by cutting of a part of the timber on the land in dispute, and a petition for a permanent injunction against the defendant, Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, for entering on the land and cutting and removing any of the said timber. The record further discloses that certain affidavits were submitted, together with the papers and the deed, to Judge John S. Wilson, who, on the 3d day of February, 1911, issued a rule to show cause, and granting a temporary restraining order, to be returnable before the Honorable J. W. De Vore at chambers, at Sumter, S. C., on February 9, 1911. By consent of counsel, however, the case was not then heard, but did come up before Judge De Vore at Kingstree, S. C., on February 24, 1911, at which time the defendant put in various affidavits and its answer, wherein it affirmed that it acquired all the rights of the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company under the deed, and denied that this deed was void for any of the reasons set forth in the complaint, and that it had forfeited its rights thereunder; and further answering it alleged, by way of affirmative defense, that subsequent to the execution of the deed to the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company that the said lumber company, under the authority of its board of directors, borrowed $1,000,000 through the Colonial Trust Company, and that such holders of the evidence of indebtedness were bona fide purchasers without notice, and that they were entitled to be protected as such, and that the plaintiff herein was estopped as against such bona fide purchasers. Upon the showing thus made before him, Judge De Vore dismissed the temporary injunction granted by Judge Wilson, and refused to grant a permanent injunction, and held that the deed in question was not subject to any of the objections urged by the plaintiff, and that the defendants were the owners in fee of the timber upon the land. Due notice of the intention to appeal was given, and it now comes to this court upon exceptions, which are in turn simplified by appellant's counsel to the following three propositions of alleged error: (1) Was there error on the part of the circuit judge in dissolving the temporary restraining order, and in refusing the interlocutory injunction? (2) Was there error on the part of the circuit judge in holding that the timber deed in question vested an absolute unlimited estate in fee simple, and that the clause fixing time limit could not operate to qualify or restrict the estate thus granted, so as to require the grantee to cut and remove the timber within a reasonable time?

(3) Was there error on the part of the circuit judge in holding that the deed is not void as being against public policy, (a) in that it tends to retard the growth of agriculture, and (b) in that it requires the grantor and his privies in estate to pay taxes indefinitely upon both the land and the timber?

[1] For purposes of convenience, we will consider the alleged errors as summarized in the reverse order, and we find that most of the questions raised are disposed of by the recent case of Flagler v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, 89 S. C. 328, 71 S. E. 849, where this court held in effect, first, that a deed such as this is, in all essential respects, carried with it the necessity on the part of the grantee of commencing the work of removal within a reasonable time from the date of the grant; this intention being found from the language of the grant itself. It is to be remembered that in this case there is in the grant itself, on page 12 thereof, and prior to the habendum clause, the expression in reference to the grantee, "to be exercised at any and all times during the continuance of this contract," and, again, and also before the habendum clause, the same language occurs, "at any time during this contract, or at or after its termination," the right to remove by the defendant of certain property. Both of these clauses in the deed, and prior to its habendum clause, indicate an intention on the part of the party of a time limit to the contract itself. Further on it is stated in the second covenant, on page 14 of the case, that the lumber is granted for a period of 10 years "beginning from the time that the said second party, its successors or assigns, begins the cutting and removing of the aforesaid timber," etc. Construing similar provisions to be found in the case of Flagler v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, we said: "It is contended by the respondent that this language is plain, simple, and unambiguous, simply meaning that when the owner of the timber commences cutting that he must finish within 10 years; but the obstacle in the way of the adoption of this view is that it presupposes that the grant was for an indefinite period, and there is nothing in the grant to show when the removing and the cutting of the timber is to begin. So it would follow that there is nothing to prevent the grantee from indefinitely holding the land and its original condition: For, while it is admitted that the work of cutting and removing must be done within the period of 10 years from the date of commencing, it is maintained that it lies solely within the discretion of the grantee to determine when he will commence." And the court concluded that this could not have been the intention of the parties. And the general rule was announced to be as follows, after the examination of the authorities, page 346 of 89 S. C., page 855 of 71 S. E.: "Suffice it to say that we are of the opinion that, both by the inherent reason of the thing, as well as by authority, the parties had in view some time for the commencing of the removing of the timber, which intention was not embodied in the terms of the contract; that the law will presume and will enforce that such commencing of the removing of the timber shall be within a reasonable time from the date of the contract."

It was further laid down in that case that what constituted a reasonable time would not be passed upon by this court, unless first passed upon by the circuit judge. The circuit judge in this case, as in that, has not passed upon what would constitute a reasonable time, and for the reasons herein set out at length it follows that the court erred in holding in effect that the defendant respondent could commence removing this timber at their will, and that such right would continue to exist as long as any trees were living which were in existence at the time of the making of the contract, but, on the contrary, should have held that, whilst unquestionably the title granted by McClary would convey to the defendant's assignor the fee to such timber, it was a qualified or determinable fee, subject to be defeated by the failure upon the part of the grantee to exercise the rights granted him within a reasonable time. We say again, as we said then, that what constitutes a reasonable time is a question to be determined upon the merits of each case, and its ascertainment rests upon what was the situation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract, and for this purpose it follows that this case must be remanded in order that the parties to this suit may introduce evidence showing the facts surrounding the contracting parties, in order that the court may determine what was a reasonable time, as viewed by the situation of the parties when the contract was signed.

[2] The appellant insists that the court below was in error in refusing to grant the permanent injunction asked for, and in dissolving the temporary injunction granted by Judge Wilson, and asks this court to review that action. The question by this exception is not without grave difficulties. The facts are that upon a showing made ex parte, before Judge Wilson, a restraining order is obtained and a rule to show cause why an injunction should not be granted during the pending litigation, returnable before Judge De Vore, when the return is made, including the answer of the defendant, accompanied by various affidavits. Upon the merits as shown, the circuit judge dissolved the restraining order and refused to grant the injunction, from which action the plaintiff duly appealed. Counsel for respondent insists that the position taken by counsel for the appellant is new, and was not urged before the trial judge, and that for this reason should not now be considered under cases cited. It is impossible for this court to pass upon such a question. The question of an injunction was certainly before the trial court, as shown by the records and the second paragraph of the judge's decree. Whether the reasons then assigned are the same as those now urged, we have no means of ascertainment, and it could not be assumed that they are different, even if a difference of reasoning were material, which we do not assert to be the case. In this case no injunction was granted. The recent case of Crawford v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, 77 S. C. 81, 83, 57 S. E. 670, 671, seems to be in point. There a temporary injunction was granted by Judge Dantzler, and subsequently dissolved by Judge Gary, the case being, as this is, a timber case, and the injunction prayed for was to restrain the cutting of timber, as here. Judge Gary based his order of dissolution upon the ground that "an inspection of the complaint shows that it is general in its allegation, showing that irreparable damage would arise, or such damages as could not be fully compensated for in an action at law. Further, there is no allegation of the insolvency of the defendant." And this court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Jones, said: "Where the action is for the sole purpose of an injunction, and a temporary injunction is essential to the assertion and preservation of a legal right, if established as alleged in the complaint, it is error of law to refuse or set aside a temporary injunction"—citing Alderman & Sons Co. v. Wilson, 69 S. C. 159 [48 S. E. 85]. The Chief Justice proceeded to state that the temporary injunction did not work automatically, even if the complaint stated a cause of action, but that the trial judge must consider the showing made by the defendant, and then, reverting to the facts in that case, found that no showing at all was made by the defendant, and the complaint having stated a cause of action held that the circuit judge erred in dissolving the injunction, and reversed this order and restored the injunction. In that case, as in this, the injury sought to be prevented was the cutting of the timber; there, as here, the temporary injunction was set aside, and appeal to this court had; the only difference between the two cases was that in that case no showing was made by the defendant, whilst in this case the showing made under the deed by the defendant was insufficient. In principle, is there any difference between no showing and an inadequate one? In some cases possibly there may be, but not under the classes of cases now being considered; for, as the Chief Justice held in the Crawford Case, supra: "The injury complained of in this case is the threatened destruction of the timber and trees on the plaintiff's land, a permanent injury to the substance of their estate, and falls within the class of injuries generally deemed in equity to be irreparable." So despite the discretion wisely vested in the circuit court, when by his construction of the timber deed he necessarily denied the injunction, that construction being erroneous, the injunction became an essential part of the plaintiff's rights, and the injunction is therefore restored, pending the determination of the question of a reasonable time, hereinbefore remanded to the circuit court for determination.

COOGLER et al. v. CROSBY et al.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 495*)—PRESUMPTIONS—JURISDICTION—PROCESS.

The entire absence of proof of service in the record of a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is not to be taken as conclusive evidence that no service was made, and the court before which the judgment roll is offered in evidence must presume that proper proof of service was submitted to the court rendering the judgment, under the rule that all presumptions must be indulged in favor of the jurisdiction of the court of general jurisdiction; and to avoid such a judgment for want of jurisdiction the jurisdictional defects must affirmatively appear of record.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 490*)—WANT OF JURISDICTION—REMEDY.

Where the record of a judgment in a court of general jurisdiction does not show service, it is not for that reason void on its face; and the only remedy of the party claiming not to have been served is by direct proceedings to have the judgment set aside.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Anna Coogler and others against Sallie Crosby and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. D. Martin and Graham & Sturkie, for appellants. A. S. & W. D. Douglas, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The main question involved in this action for partition is whether the circuit court ruled correctly in holding that the plaintiffs were bound by a former judgment and sale of the land in pursuance thereof, under which the defendants, who are respondents in the appeal, claim.

[1] The alleged fatal objection to the validity of the former judgment and to its admission in evidence was that there was not found in the record the requisite proof of service on some of the plaintiffs, who were then infants. The record did not contain the affidavit or official certificate of service required by law; but it does contain petitions, duly signed, for the appointment of guardians ad litem for the infants, reciting the service on the infants, the answer of the guardians ad litem on behalf of the infants, and the judgment of the court of common pleas, directing a sale of the land, dated September 23, 1880. "All presumptions must be indulged in favor of the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction. To avoid such a judgment for want of jurisdiction, the jurisdictional defects must appear affirmatively on the record." Ex parte Gray, 48 S. C. 566, 26 S. E. 786. The entire absence of proof of service is not to be taken as conclusive evidence that no such service was made; on the contrary, the court before which the judgment roll is offered in evidence must presume that the court, on the hearing of the case in which the judgment was rendered, had before it proper proof of the service of the summons, or it would not have rendered the judgment. Ex parte Pearson, 79 S. C. 302, 60 S. E. 706; Voorhees v. Jackson, 10 Pet. 440, 9 L. Ed. 490.

[2] In such case the judgment is not void on its face, and the only remedy of a party claiming not to have been served is by a direct proceeding to have the judgment set aside. The rule on the subject is thus well stated by Mr. Justice Jones, in Clark v. Neves, 76 S. C. 484, 57 S. E. 614, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 298: "When it appears affirmatively on the face of the record that an infant has not been served with summons, the infant is not bound by the proceedings. Bailey v. Bailey, 41 S. C. 337 [19 S. E. 669, 728, 44 Am. St. Rep. 713]. If the record is silent as to such jurisdictional matters with respect to a court of general jurisdiction, it will be presumed that what ought to have been done was done; but, when the record discloses the manner in which service on infants was attempted to be made, there is no presumption that they were served in any other way. Rice v. Bamberg, 59 S. C. 505 [38 S. E. 209]."

[3] The other point made by the appeal involves the construction of the following devise in the will of Jessie Wirick: "I give, devise, and bequeath to Simon Mobley and his children, Shadrac Countee and his children, Hilliard Countee and his children forever the balance of the Alston or Martin tract and what is known as the Adam Wirick-Piney Woods tract and the Taylor tract." Contrary to the contention of appellants, the law is settled that the persons named and their children living at the death of the testator took the land to the exclusion of their children born after the death of the testator. Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord, Eq. 214, 16 Am. Dec. 648; Robinson v. Harris, 73 S. C. 469, 53 S. E. 755, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 330.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

6. MORTGAGES (§ 372*)—FORECLOSURE—REFUSAL TO SELL—ACTION BY BIDDER—ILLEGAL SALE.

Where a second bidder for land at foreclosure sale, under a power, took no title because of the auctioneer's want of authority to sell without readvertisement, he could not recover damages from the mortgagee for failure to sell pursuant to his bid, irrespective of whether the first bidder acquired title under his bid and deed from the mortgagee.

7. MORTGAGES (§ 372*)—FORECLOSURE—ACTING WITHOUT AUTHORITY—KNOWLEDGE OF THIRD PERSONS.

Where the bidder at a second auction sale in foreclosure, under a power, which was invalid because the bidders at the first sale had dispersed and the second sale was not advertised, knew of those facts when he bid, he cannot recover damages from the mortgagee on the ground that he was misled to his injury by the mortgagee's assumption of power to sell, since he was charged by his knowledge of the facts with notice of the mortgagee's want of power to sell; an agent not being liable in damages for acting without authority, if the person dealing with him knows of the facts depriving him of authority.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Justice, Judge.

Action by W. T. Love against Caleb Harris. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Heywood Sawyer, for appellant. E. F. Aydtlett, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages of the defendant for failure to comply with a bid made by the plaintiff at a sale, under a power contained in a mortgage to him. On January 9, 1905, Richard Harris and wife executed to the defendant, Caleb Harris, a mortgage on land, to secure the payment of a certain indebtedness, with power of sale in case of default by the said Richard Harris in the payment of the debt. On December 21, 1909, the mortgagor having failed to pay the debt, the defendant advertised the land for sale, under and by virtue of the power vested in him by the deed of mortgage, and on January 22, 1910, he sold the same through an auctioneer, J. C. Spence, at public outcry, and one Cader Jennings, who was and is solvent, bid the sum of $1,500 for the land, and it was struck off to him at the said price. The auctioneer immediately made, on the back of the notice of sale, the following entry: "Sold to Cader Jennings for $1,500, Jan. 22, 1910." After the sale had been completed and after the bidders had dispersed, the said Jennings refused to comply with his bid, and stated to the auctioneer, in the presence of the defendant, that he was bidding for Elijah Harrell; that he did not want the land himself; and that he would have to sell it again. Under the advice of a friend, the auctioneer sold the land again on the same day, after the bidders had dispersed, the defendant being present at the sale, and also the said Cader Jennings, and the plaintiff became the purchaser at the price of $1,175; there being only a few persons at the sale and no new advertisement of the sale having been made. The defendant refused to make title to the plaintiff and executed a deed for the land to Cader Jennings, who, in the meantime, had agreed to abide by his purchase. Out of the money paid by Jennings, the defendant retained a sufficient amount to pay his debt and expenses of sale, and paid the balance over to the mortgagor, whose consent was never given to the second sale. The plaintiff now sues to recover the difference between the real value of the land—that is, $1,500, the amount bid by Jennings—and the amount bid by himself at the second sale. When the plaintiff bought at the second sale, the auctioneer made the same kind of entry on the notice as he had done when Jennings bid; that is, an entry to the effect that he had sold the land to the plaintiff on the said day for the sum of $1,175. At the close of the evidence for the plaintiff, the defendant demurred thereto and moved to dismiss, or for judgment as of nonsuit, under the statute. The motion was allowed. Judgment was entered for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

[1] We are of the opinion that the judge correctly decided the case. When a sale is made at auction, the auctioneer is the agent both of the vendor and the vendee. It has been said that, until the fall of the hammer, he is the agent of the vendor, but when the property is struck off to the purchaser by the auctioneer he then becomes the agent of the vendee. The vendor employs the auctioneer to make the memorandum of sale, and the buyer, by bidding, sanctions the authority of the officer to do so. He, therefore, has the power to sign the memorandum, so as to bind the vendee to the terms of the sale. 1 Reed, Statute of Frauds, §§ 315 and 316, and cases cited in the notes. The principle is recognized in the case of Mayer v. Adrian, 77 N. C. 83, where it was assumed that the auctioneer has the right to sign the memorandum for the vendee, though in that case it was held that the memorandum was not sufficient, as it was not physically attached to the written notice or offer of sale; nor did it in any way refer to that paper, so as to constitute, with it, a complete memorandum, showing the names of the parties and the terms of the contract of sale. See, also, the case of Gwathney v. Cason, 74 N. C. 5, 21 Am. Rep. 484, where it is said that an auctioneer is authorized by the bidder to sign his name to the memorandum or contract of sale.

[2, 3] It is not necessary that the vendee's name should be subscribed to the memorandum, but it is sufficient if it appears in the body of the instrument, and the intention is manifested thereby to bind the vendee by the instrument. Mr. Smith, in his work on Contracts (7th Ed.) at marginal page 93, states the law very clearly in regard to this matter, when he says: "There is a third point common to all the five contracts mentioned in the fourth section; it is with regard to the signature. The words are, you will recollect, 'signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him law- fully authorized.' The signature, it is obvious, is most regularly and properly placed at the foot or end of the instrument signed; but it is decided in many cases, that, although the signature be in the middle or beginning of the instrument, it is as binding as if at the foot, although, if not signed regularly at the foot, there is always a question whether the party meant to be bound by it as it stood, or whether it was left so unsigned because he refused to complete it. But, when it is ascertained that he meant to be bound by it as a complete contract, the statute is satisfied; there being a note in writing showing the terms of the contract, and signed by him. Therefore, where, in the case of the sale of a quantity of cotton yarn, a bill of parcels was sent by the seller to the purchaser, headed: 'London, 24th Oct., 1812. Messrs. John Schneider & Co., bought of Thomas Norris & Co., agents, cotton yarn and piece goods. No. 3, Freeman's Court, Cornhill.' Following this was a list of the articles sold, the particulars, quantities and prices—it was held, in an action for not delivering the yarn, to contain a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the requirement of the statute as to the signature of the party to be charged. In this case, the whole of the heading of the bill of parcels was printed, except the words, 'Messrs. John Schneider & Co.' But as it was then given out to the other contracting party by the party to be charged, recognizing the printed name as much as if he had subscribed his mark to it, he had recognized and avowed it as his signature." The auctioneer's memorandum in this case was made at the very time of the sale and was written on the notice, and this was sufficient to make a complete contract of sale, the memorandum being physically attached to the notice, or so connected with it as to constitute a sufficient reference to it, and so that they may be read together as parts of one and the same paper; the latter being an offer to sell the property (describing it), and the memorandum on the notice being an acceptance of the offer upon the terms contained therein.

In Proctor v. Finley, 119 N. C. 536, 26 S. E. 128, this court held that advertising a sale of land at auction is an offer to sell at the highest bid, and the person who makes the last and highest bid thereby accepts the offer, and the sale is complete, the auctioneer being the agent of the vendor to sell the land, and of the bidder to complete the sale, by making and signing a proper memorandum thereof, and that the statute of frauds, as adopted in this state, does not require that the name or signature of the bidder should be subscribed to the memorandum, but the latter may be in any form which indicates that he has accepted the offer and agrees to be bound by the contract of sale. The name of the bidder and the price, in that case, were written on the side of the notice, and this was held to be a good memorandum; citing Gwathney

v. Cason, 74 N. C. 5, 21 Am. Rep. 484; Mayer v. Adrian, 77 N. C. 83; Browne on the Statute of Frauds, § 369; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. 848 and 849. The rule is thus stated in 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, page 856: "When the statute requires the memorandum to be 'signed,' it is immaterial in what part of the instrument the name of the party appears, whether at the top, in the middle, or at the bottom thereof, if applicable to the whole substance of the agreement, and written by the party, or by his authority, with the intention of thereby executing the same as a binding obligation. A printed name upon a paper, which is delivered under circumstances showing an intention to regard the printed name as the person's own, will suffice, as will an entry in a book containing the owner's name at the top of the page. When the statute requires that the memorandum be 'subscribed,' the signing must be a literal one at the end of the instrument. It is not necessary that the signature should be a part of the agreement itself. It is sufficient if it be indorsed upon it as a notification of the assent of the party, or if it be written in a letter or memorandum which refers to the agreement. The statute does not require that both parties shall sign one paper containing the contract. The subscription may be upon separate papers, as where counterpart memoranda are made and signed by the respective parties, or where an offer in writing is followed by a written acceptance of the same." The case of Dickerson v. Simmons, 141 N. C. 325, 53 S. E. 850 (opinion by Justice Brown), is distinguishable. There no sufficient memorandum referring to the written notice or offer of sale was made, but the principle herein stated was fully recognized. In our case, the entry on the notice was equivalent to an acceptance of the offer of sale at the price, and as much so as if the acceptance had been expressed in explicit terms and signed by the auctioneer, as agent for the vendee. It is just as indicative of his purpose to buy upon the terms of the offer and at the amount of the bid, as was the entry in the Proctor Case, if not more so. But, if the first memorandum had not been sufficient, the plaintiff cannot profit by the defect, as his memorandum is identical with it, and he therefore acquired no right, under the statute, by his bid and the entry of the auctioneer upon the notice of sale to call for a deed.

As both parties signed the memorandum in this case, the mortgagee having signed the notice, which was witnessed by the auctioneer, and the defendant having, within the meaning of the statute, signed the memorandum by his agent, duly authorized, it is unnecessary to decide another question in regard to what is a sufficient signing of the memorandum. The statute says it must be "signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some other person by him thereto lawfully authorized." Commenting on this part of the statute, Mr. Smith, at marginal page 96 of his work on Contracts, says: "The signature is to be that of the party to be charged, and therefore, though, as I have pointed out to you, both sides of the agreement must appear in the writing, it is not necessary that it should be signed by both the parties; it is sufficient if the party suing on it is able to produce a writing signed by the party whom he is seeking to charge. And such a writing signed is sufficient to satisfy the fourth section, though it be only a proposal accepted by parol by the party to whom it is made. The person, however, who seeks to enforce the agreement has not the other altogether at his mercy, but must either do, or be ready to do, his own part of the agreement, before he can seek performance on the part of the person who has signed." Davis v. Martin, 146 N. C. 281, 59 S. E. 700; Love v. Atkinson, 131 N. C. 544, 42 S. E. 966.

[4] But, while the memorandum was sufficient within the statute of frauds, the sale to the plaintiff by the defendant and the auctioneer was invalid. If the purchaser at an auction sale is unable or refuses to comply with his bid before the bidders disperse, the property may be sold without a fresh advertisement, or the property may be afterwards sold, if it has been newly advertised. Discussing this subject, it is said, in 27 Cyc. at page 1486, that the bidder is liable for the amount of his bid, which may be recovered in a proper suit against him, or, if he is unable to comply with his bid, the property may be put up for sale a second time. This may be done immediately, if the purchaser's refusal or inability is clearly manifested, and the necessity of advertising a second time or giving new notices may be avoided if the resale is made on the spot and before the bidders disperse, although otherwise there must be a new publication and evidence of the trustee's or mortgagee's continuing authority to make the sale. It is no valid objection to such a resale that the property did not bring as much as at the first sale. In Barnard v. Duncan, 38 Mo. 170, 90 Am. Dec. 416, the very question we have here was presented. The bidder had refused, after the sale, to accept the deed because it did not contain covenants of warranty, and with reference to this the court said: "Upon the refusal to accept it, the trustee proceeded at once to put up the property for sale again, at the same place, on the same day, without readvertising or any new notice, and, few persons being present, the property was resold for $25. This proceeding can neither be justified nor sustained. It was, in practical effect, a sale without notice. The sale, as advertised, had taken place several days before, and all bidders had departed. Though yet within the hours mentioned in the advertisement, it cannot be considered a fair and valid sale pursuant to notice. There should have been a new publication of notice for another day." It was so held in the case of Dover v. Kennerly, 38 Mo. 469, the following being the headnote.

which fairly states the substance of the opinion: "Where property offered for sale at auction by a trustee in a deed of trust is knocked down to the highest bidder, the sale may be enforced in equity in a suit for a specific performance, or the bidder may be held liable at law for the damages sustained. When the purchaser to whom the property is struck off at a trustee's sale at auction fails to complete his purchase, the property must be re-advertised for sale." McClung v. Trust Company, 137 Mo. 106, 38 S. W. 578. In this case it appears that the second sale was made after the bidders had dispersed and without any new advertisement. The trustee and auctioneer had no power or authority from the mortgagor to release the first bidder and sell to the second bidder for a less price. The mortgagor was vitally interested in this transaction, as, if we should hold that the second sale was valid, he would lose $325.

[5, 6] Jennings was bound by his bid, and, as we have seen, it could have been enforced against him by a suit in equity, now a civil action. We hold the second sale, which was made to the plaintiff, to be invalid for the reasons stated, and as the mortgagee has made a deed to Jennings, in accordance with his bid, for the full amount of $1,500, and as the mortgagor has assented to the execution of this deed by receiving the balance of the purchase money, after paying the debts, costs, and expenses, we think Jennings must be declared to be the owner of the land, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover against the mortgagor, who is the defendant in this action, the difference between his bid and the real value of the land, according to his contention. It can make no difference, so far as he is concerned, whether Jennings acquired title to the land under his bid and the subsequent deed from the mortgagee, for it is sufficient to decide that the plaintiff acquired no right or title by virtue of his bid at the second sale, as the mortgagee had no power or authority to sell to him.

[7] The plaintiff cannot recover upon the ground that the mortgagee assumed to exercise a power to sell which he did not have, and that he was thereby misled or deceived to his injury, for the simple reason that he bought with full knowledge of all the facts, and as he is presumed to know the law he was fixed with notice of the fact that the mortgagee did not have the power to sell under the circumstances, and therefore he was in no sense defrauded. In Le Roy v. Jacobowsky, 136 N. C. 443, 48 S. E. 796, 67 L. R. A. 977, Justice Connor, quoting from Reinhard on Agency, § 308, and other authorities, says: "If the party with whom the agent has contracted knew that the agent had no authority, or was cognizant of all the facts upon which the assumption of authority was based, as, for example, when both parties labored under a mistake of law with reference to the liability of the principal, the agent is not liable, either in tort or upon the contract.' Newport v. Smith, 61 Minn. 277 [63 N. W. 734]; Baltzen v. Nicolay, 53 N. Y. 467. In Michael v. Jones, 84 Mo. 578, the justice writing for the court says: 'But I am satisfied that under the best-considered modern decisions the principle invoked by the plaintiff cannot be carried to such an extent. The true rule, I think, is that, as to the liability of the principal, the fact that the principal cannot be held is no ground for charging the agent with liability.' Ruffin, J., in Fowle v. Kerchner, supra [87 N. C. 49], says: "The general rule is that whenever a party assumes to act as agent for another, if he has no authority, or if he exceeds his authority, he will be held to be personally liable to the party with whom he deals, for the reason that by holding himself out as having authority he misleads the other party into making the agreement. But the rule is founded upon the supposition * * * that the want of authority is unknown to the other party, or, if known, that the agent undertakes to guarantee a ratification of the act, and when this want of authority is known, and it is clear that the agent did not undertake to guarantee a ratification, it results that the agent is not personally bound.' " In this case, as we have indicated, the plaintiff had full notice of the situation, and will be held, therefore, to have known all the facts, and it is clear that the mortgagee did not undertake to guarantee a ratification by the mortgagor, so that the essential elements of a warranty as to the authority of the defendant to sell to him is lacking, and he cannot justly claim to have been deceived or defrauded. There is therefore no error in the case.

No error.

DAMRON & KELLY v. CITIZENS' NAT. BANK OF CLINTWOOD.

ATTACHMENT (§ 87*)—AFFIDAVIT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code 1904, § 2964, which requires affidavits in attachments to be made by the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney, affidavits of attachment in favor of a bank, signed by individuals as vice president and as director, without any explanation, are insufficient; it not appearing on the face of the affidavits that such officials are agents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-220; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dickenson County.

Attachment by the Citizens' National Bank of Clintwood against W. C. D. Sutherland and others, in which Damron & Kelly intervened as subsequent attaching creditors. From a judgment for complainants, interveners appeal. Reversed, and complainants' bill dismissed.

Chase & Daugherty, for appellants. Skeen & Skeen and W. H. Rouse, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. This is an appeal from two decrees of the circuit court of Dickenson county in two chancery causes heard together, which were attachments in equity, sued out by the appellee bank against W. C. D. Sutherland in the one case, and against W. C. D. Sutherland, Lizzie Sutherland, and Frances Vanover in the other. The appellants, J. K. Damron and D. G. Kelly, who were subsequent attaching creditors, appeared by consent of counsel and with leave of court, for the purpose of moving the court to quash the attachment of the appellee bank in each case, upon the ground that the affidavits upon which the attachments were issued did not comply with section 2964 of the Code, which requires such affidavits to be made by the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney. From the two decrees overruling the motion to quash and directing a sale of the property attached, this appeal has been taken.

The affidavit in one case was made by C. C. Childress, who signed the same, "C. C. Childress, Vice President;" and in the other case the affidavit was made by J. H. Long, who signed the same "J. H. Long, Director." The question presented is whether either the vice president or director of a bank is such an agent of the corporation, in contemplation of the attachment laws, as to authorize either of them, by virtue of his office, without other authority, to make the required affidavit.

This question has been fully discussed and decided by this court in the case of Taylor v. Sutherland-Meade Co., 107 Va. 787, 60 S. E. 132, where it is held that an attachment awarded to a corporation as plaintiff, based upon the affidavit of its secretary and treasurer, as such and without more, cannot be maintained. The principle there settled is equally controlling in the case of the vice president or a director of a corporation. The court cannot say, as a matter of law, in the absence of averment, that the term "vice president" or "director" necessarily imports the relation of agency between such officer and his corporation, within the intentment of the statute laws of this state, which require the affidavit to be made by "the plaintiff, his agent or attorney." If he is in fact such agent, it should be averred in the affidavit. Attachment laws being in derogation of the common law and harsh in their application, substantial compliance with their requirements must be made to appear on the face of the proceedings.

Correct practice requires the affidavit to aver that the affiant is "the plaintiff, his agent or attorney," according to the fact, and compliance with the rule imposes no undue hardship upon the attaching creditor. In the case of a corporation, it can appoint as many agents as it pleases, with specific authority to make such affidavits.

The appellee bank having failed to comply with the law concerning the affidavits upon which its attachments were issued, we are of opinion that the circuit court erred in overruling the motion of the appellants to abate the same.

The decrees complained of must therefore be reversed, and the two bills filed by the appellee in these attachment cases will be dismissed.

Reversed.

WINGFIELD v. MCGHEE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 14, 1911.)

1. EQUITY (§ 71*)—DEFENSES—LACHES.

Mere delay in bringing an action is not always laches barring it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 204-211; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. EQUITY (§ 340*)—PLEADING—VERIFICATION—EFFECT AS TO PROOF—RESPONSIVENESS OF ANSWER.

The complaint in a suit to subject land to the payment of a legacy to plaintiff by the original owner alleged that the original owner devised the land to his daughters and devised $300 to complainant to be paid by them, which was made a charge upon the land; that the daughters conveyed the land to defendant subject to complainant's claim, and that complainant had made frequent futile demands upon defendant for its payment; that the land is the only estate out of which the legacy can be satisfied, and the prayer was that it be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the legacy and for further relief. Held, that an allegation of the answer, which was under oath, that, if complainant ever had any claim upon the realty, it was settled during the lifetime of testator's daughters by an agreement between complainant and the daughters, was not responsive to the bill, but was new matter in avoidance of complainant's claim, so as to require defendant to prove such settlement by proof other than the sworn answer.

3. WILLS (§ 733*)—LEGACIES—DISCHARGE.

The requirement of a will that a legacy charged upon land should be paid as soon as convenient meant that it should be paid within a reasonable time under the circumstances, and not that it should never be paid, or not paid until after the death of the devisees of the land.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1036*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ABSENCE OF PARTIES.

A decree for complainant in a suit to have land sold to satisfy a legacy to complainant which was a charge upon it should not be reversed because of the failure to make the personal representatives of the devisees parties, where there was no demurrer or objection below on that ground, and it is not shown that such devisees left personalty out of which the legacy could be paid, even if it would be liable for its payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1036.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Appomattox County.

Suit by Mary J. McGhee against Alexander S. Wingfield and others. From a decree for complainant, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

The bill alleged that complainant, Mary J. McGhee, is the daughter of Minervia Linthicum, and granddaughter of Thomas Wingfield, who died about the year 1849; that the said Thomas Wingfield left a will; that the said Thomas Wingfield devised to his five daughters, Ann H. Wingfield, Martha W. Wingfield, Jane S. Wooten, Mary G. Eubank, and Betsy Smith, a farm containing 250 acres; that to your oratrix, Mary J. Linthicum, granddaughter of the testator, he devised the sum of $300, to be paid by the said Ann H. Wingfield, Martha W. Wingfield, Jane S. Wooten, Mary G. Eubank, and Betsy Smith, which was made a charge upon the said land; that all of the children aforesaid of the testator are now dead, and that oratrix and A. S. Wingfield (the defendant) are the only children surviving the said daughters of the testator; that the said Ann H. Wingfield, Martha W. Wingfield, Jane S. Wooten, and Mary G. Eubank deeded to A. S. Wingfield the said tract of land, bearing date on the 18th day of February, 1881, subject, however, to the claim of the oratrix; that oratrix has made frequent demands for the payment of this claim without avail; that, in further support of her claim she begs to file herewith the letter of Jane S. Wooten, sister of your oratrix's mother, dated January 25, 1864, and marked "Exhibit B," in which the admission of her claim is made as well as the liability, also the letter of A. S. Wingfield, dated February 28, 1888, and marked "Exhibit C," which letter admits a claim due your oratrix; that the said tract of land is the only estate out of which your complainant's debt can be made, together with the interest thereon. Wherefore complainant prays that A. S. Wingfield be made a party to this bill and be made to answer the same; that the said real estate be sold and the proceeds thereof be applied to the payment of said claim, which is a charge as aforesaid on said land, and any residue thereof be distributed among the parties entitled thereto; and that all such other general and further relief be afforded your complainant as the nature of her case shall require or to equity shall seem meet, and she shall ever pray, etc.

H. D. Flood, for appellant. G. E. Caskie and A. H. Clement, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. This suit was brought by the appellee Mrs. Mary J. McGhee against the appellant, Alexander S. Wingfield, and others, to subject a tract of land owned by him to the payment of a legacy of $300, which, as is alleged, was a charge upon the said tract of land. The relief sought was granted, and from that decree this appeal was taken.

The record shows that Thomas Wingfield died during or before the year 1856, leaving a will which was probated in the county court of Appomattox county at its November term, 1856. The records of that court were destroyed by fire in the year 1892, and there is not, it seems, a complete copy of the will in existence. But an extract from and a memorandum of the contents of the will, made by an attorney and filed with his deposition in the cause, and a recital in the deed under which the appellant acquired title to the land sought to be subjected to the payment of the legacy, show that Thomas Wingfield, by his said will, devised to his five daughters the said tract of land, and, in the event of the death of any of them without lawful issue, her interest in the property devised was to pass to the surviving daughter or daughters, and that he gave a legacy of $300 to the complainant, his granddaughter, then Linthicum, now McGhee, to be paid as soon as convenient, and which was made a charge upon the land devised them. In the year 1881 four of the daughters of the testator, one of them having died without issue, conveyed the land to the appellant in consideration of services rendered and to be rendered in supporting and maintaining them. In that deed it is stated that they acquired title to the land under the will of their father, and that they further transferred and conveyed to the appellant "all our right, title and interest in and to the $300 charged upon our farm in favor of Mary J. Linthicum, which sum has never been paid, and which is to revert to us in case the said Mary J. Linthicum dies without a lawful heir."

In the year 1888 the appellant, in reply to a letter from the complainant, wrote to her that it was true that her aunts, one of whom was his mother, had conveyed the land to him for the purpose of compensating him for providing for the grantors during their lives, but with no intention whatever of depriving her of her legacy, and expressing a willingness to cut off a part of the land to satisfy her legacy, or to do the best he could towards paying it in money.

The first error assigned is that the trial court erred in not sustaining the defense based upon the laches of the complainant in asserting her claim.

It is true that her right accrued nearly a half century ago, but it clearly appears from the admissions of the devisees of the land upon which it was charged that the legacy was still due and unpaid, and was fully recognized in the year 1881 when they conveyed the land to the appellant, and its validity as an existing liability upon the land is distinctly admitted by the appellant in his letter to the complainant in the year 1888.

It further appears that the parties whose duty it was to pay the legacy were closely related to the complainant, that the devisees were poor and afflicted, and never financially able to pay it without a sale, in whole or in part, of the land upon which it was charged, and there is no pretense that the appellant ever paid anything on account of it.

[1] Mere delay is not always to be considered laches. Jameson v. Rixey, 94 Va. 347, 28 S. E. 861, 64 Am. St. Rep. 726. If the facts and circumstances already adverted to do not fully explain the complainant's delay in asserting her claim, it satisfactorily appears that her legacy has never been abandoned or paid, and that no injustice will result to any one from subjecting to its payment the land upon which it is charged.

The answer of the appellant, which was under oath, after denying that the complainant's legacy was a charge upon the land, contains the following allegation: "But, if the complainant ever had any claim upon the said real estate, respondent alleges and charges that this claim was settled years ago, and during the lifetime of the survivors of the said five daughters, and that a full and complete settlement was then arranged and entered into between the complainant, on the one hand, and the survivors of the five daughters, on the other hand, satisfactory to both parties, which completely and entirely settled the demand of the complainant."

The appellant introduced no evidence of any such agreement and settlement, but his contention is that the statement in his answer was under oath and responsive to the allegations of the bill, which did not waive answer under oath, and was, therefore, conclusive evidence that the legacy had been settled, as set out in the answer, and that the trial court erred in not so holding.

[2] The statement in the answer was not responsive to any allegation of the bill, but set up new matter in avoidance of the complainant's claim. The burden was therefore on the appellant to prove such agreement and settlement by independent proof. It is well settled that where the answer is not responsive to the bill, or sets up affirmative allegations of new matter in avoidance of the complainant's demand, and is replied to, the answer is of no avail as evidence in respect to such allegations, and the respondent is as much bound to establish the allegations by independent testimony as the complainant is to sustain his bill. Vathir v. Zane, 6 Grat. 246, 261; Seitz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 580, 24 L. Ed. 179; 1 Daniel's Chy. Pr. 844, note; 1 Barton's Chy. Pr. 419.

It is also insisted by the appellant that, inasmuch as the complainant's legacy was made payable when or as soon as it was convenient for the devisees of the land to pay it, it was never a charge upon the land, since they were poor and afflicted and never able to pay it, or, if it was payable at all, it was not payable until after the death of the devisees.

[3] Neither of these contentions can be sustained. The requirement that the legacy should be paid when or as soon as convenient meant that it was payable in a reasonable time, under all the circumstances of the case, and not that it should never be paid or not paid until after the death of the devisees. See Chichester v. Vass, 1 Munf. 98, 4 Am. Dec. 531; Howes' Ex'rs v. Woodruff, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 640, 642; Lewis v. Tipton, 10 Ohio St. 88, 75 Am. Dec. 498; Barnett v. Bullett, 11 Ind. 310.

[4] It is also insisted that the decree appealed from is erroneous because the personal representatives of the devisees of the land were not made parties to the suit. There was no demurrer to the bill nor objection made in the trial court on that ground. There is no suggestion that these devisees left any personal estate out of which the complainant's legacy could be paid, even if their personal estate, under the facts disclosed by the record, would be liable for its payment. We do not think that the decree should be reversed on that account.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree appealed from to the prejudice of the appellant, and that it should be affirmed.

ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

There was no error in the admission of evidence. The instructions to the jury upon which error was assigned were not subject to the exceptions taken thereto; nor did the court err in merely failing to explain to the jury the meaning of "the burden of proof," or of "ground for reasonable suspicion," nor in merely failing to instruct the jury as complained of. The verdict was not without evidence to support it, and the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

A corporation issued bonds and executed a mortgage to secure them. Under an equitable petition filed by the trustee named in the mortgage the property of the mortgagor was placed in the hands of receivers, and a decree of foreclosure was entered. The receivers sold at private sale the property covered by the mortgage, and, upon confirmation by the court, made a deed and delivered the property; the grantee paying an amount in cash, giving a certain note to the receivers for another amount, and assuming the payment of the bonds and buying subject to the mortgage. Held, that the directors of the mortgagor had no such title or interest as authorized them to file, in their own names as directors, a petition to enforce the contract of purchase from the original receivers or to seek to foreclose the mortgage, and to have new receivers appointed to take charge of the property sold.

COLEMAN et al. v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF EMANUEL COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 25, 1911.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 327*)—PARTIES—DEFENDANTS IN ERROR.

Civil Code 1910, § 1534, provides for an election to be held in any county to determine whether or not there shall be local taxation therein to supplement the public school fund received from the state by such county, and provides that the returns of any election held shall be made to the ordinary of the county, who shall declare the result, and further provides: "If the election is carried for local taxation, the ordinary or board of county commissioners, whichever levies the county tax, shall levy a local tax as recommended by the county board of education upon all the property of the county, not to exceed one-half of one per cent." An election was held in Emanuel county under the provisions of this section, and the ordinary declared the result to be in favor of local taxation. The plaintiffs in error, taxpayers of the county, brought suit against the county, its board of education, and its board of roads and revenue commissioners, alleging, among other things, that the vote at the election in one precinct of the county should not have been counted in consolidating the returns and declaring the result of the election, because the election therein was held at a place other than a lawfully established precinct, and that the exclusion of such vote would have worked a change in the result of the election. Complainants prayed "that the court inquire into the legality of said election, and into the truth of all complaints herein made, and that the returns be counted, and that the court inquire into all errors alleged, and decide whether said tax can be legally and constitutionally levied upon the property of petitioners and all other citizens of said county similarly situated," and for an injunction against the collection of any tax by reason of said election, and for general relief. Upon the trial of the case the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs excepted. The bill of exceptions designates as the defendants therein "Board of Education of Emanuel County et al." The acknowledgment of service was by named persons, "Attys. Deft. in Error." Held, that the county, at least, was a necessary party to the bill of exceptions.

MACON RY. & LIGHT CO. v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF MACON.

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. TAXATION (§ 200*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 137*)—EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION—STIPULATIONS IN ORDINANCE.

On September 16, 1902, the municipal authorities of the city of Macon adopted an ordinance providing for the consolidation of the Consolidated Street Railway Company, the Macon Railway & Light Company, and the Metropolitan Street Railroad Company. The consolidated company provided for by the ordinance subsequently had its name changed to that of the Macon Railway & Light Company. The ordinance granted to the consolidated company certain rights and privileges as to the exercise of its business in the city, and provided for certain things to be done by the company. The company accepted the ordinance, complied with all of its obligations thereunder, and in accordance with its terms operated a street railway and an electric lighting plant in the city. The ordinance stipulated that from January 1, 1914, a designated per cent. of the yearly gross receipts of the consolidated company should be paid into the treasury of the city, and that "the percentage of the gross receipts herein provided to be collected shall be in lieu of all license, occupation, or special tax or taxes, but shall not at any time be considered to interfere with, or in any wise prevent, the collection of the ad valorem tax upon all of the property of said company, as all other property, real and personal, in the city of Macon, is taxed," etc. Held, that the stipulation in the ordinance that the payment of the percentage of the gross receipts of the consolidated company, as provided for in the ordinance, "shall be in lieu of all license, occupation, or special tax or taxes," did not cover a tax on the franchise of the consolidated company, as provided for by the act of the General Assembly approved December 17, 1902 (Acts 1902, p. 37), nor purport to exclude the right of the city to collect a tax on the franchise of the consolidated company. Such tax on franchise is neither license nor occupation nor special tax. The ordinance expressly provided in this connection that the collection of the named percentage of the yearly gross income of the company "shall not at any time be construed to interfere with, or in any wise prevent, the collection of the ad valorem tax upon all of the property of said company, as all other property, real and personal, in the city of Macon is taxed."

(a) Accordingly, the act of the General Assembly of 1902, above referred to, did not impair the obligation of the contract as embraced in the ordinance accepted by the consolidated company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 200*; Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 354; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 200*)—EXEMPTIONS—EFFECT OF ORDINANCE—CONSTRUCTION BY PARTIES.

The language of the ordinance, stipulating that the payment by the consolidated company of a given percentage of its yearly gross receipts should "be in lieu of all license, occupation, or special tax or taxes," being clear and unambiguous, and there being no suggestion that anything was omitted therefrom by fraud, accident, or mutual mistake, it was not competent for the mayor and council of the city of Macon, on November 26, 1907, to put a different binding construction on such ordinance, in the respect indicated, by adopting a report of the then finance committee of the council to the effect that, "in the matter of the petition of the Macon Railway & Light Company," the committee had before it the members of the council making the contract with the company in September, 1902, "and it appeared from their testimony that it was the intention of the contract that the percentage on the gross receipts to be paid by the company shall be in lieu of all special tax or taxes, and that the special franchise tax, afterwards imposed by the Legislature, was intended and was actually included in this exception; [and] we recommend that the city demand only the ad valorem taxes and said percentage on gross receipts, and that the city has no right to collect any special franchise tax under the terms of the original contract, and that the settlement of their taxes be made in accordance with this report." When a subsequent council ordered the collection of the franchise tax, as provided by the act of the General Assembly of 1902, the adoption of such report, as exhibited by the ordinance in the respect indicated, could not prevent the collection of such tax. See, in this connection, City of Fitzgerald v. Witchard, 130 Ga. 552, 61 S. E. 227, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519; Horkan v. City of Moultrie, 136 Ga. 561, 71 S. E. 785.

3. DIRECTED VERDICT — REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

In view of the above rulings, the verdict directed by the court was demanded, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

KENNEDY v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF SAVANNAH. (No. 3,207.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 801*)—TORTS — DEFECTS IN HIGHWAY — PERSONS ENTITLED TO RECOVER.

A policeman is not by reason of his position as an employé of a city precluded from recovering damages from the city for personal injuries caused by the city's neglect to keep a highway in proper repair.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 801*)—TORTS — DEFECT IN HIGHWAY — PERSONS ENTITLED TO RECOVER.

Though a policeman employed by a city to patrol a particular beat so materially deviates from the route he is instructed to follow while on that beat that if the case were one falling under the ordinary law of master and servant he could not (on account of his violation of rules and instructions) recover from his employer, the city, for any injury received by him through his encountering latent dangers, known to his employer and not known to him, nevertheless, if at the time of the injury he is, in a usual and orderly way, traveling upon a public highway of the city and is hurt by a defect which the city has negligently allowed to remain in the highway, he is entitled to recover damages on the same terms that any other citizen would be.

(a) Query: Do the ordinary doctrines of the law of master and servant apply as between a city and its police officers?

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1660-1665; Dec. Dig. § 801.*]

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by R. F. Kennedy against the Mayor, etc., of City of Savannah. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

See, also, 8 Ga. App. 98, 68 S. E. 652.

E. H. Abrahams and Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error. H. E. Willson, David C. Barrow, and Saml. B. Adams, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Kennedy, a policeman of the city of Savannah, was assigned to a beat known as "Factor's Wharf." While patrolling one night, he was injured by a fall sustained on account of an alleged defect in one of the public streets of the city. He sued the city, claiming that this defective way lay within the route he should have traversed.

ed as a patrolman. The city claimed to the contrary, and insisted that he had left the beat assigned to him, and at the time of his injury was in a state of neglect of duty by not being on the street on which he should have been. The first trial resulted in a nonsuit. That judgment was reversed by this court, but on a ground not here presented. See Kennedy v. Savannah, 8 Ga. App. 98, 68 S. E. 652. In the trial now under review, the court directed a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the evidence undisputedly shows that at the time the plaintiff was injured he had deviated from the route assigned to him by his superior officer, and that he could not look to his employer, the city, for compensation for an injury which he received while he was thus violating or neglecting his duty. For the purposes of this decision, we will not go into the question as to whether the evidence demanded a finding that the plaintiff had materially deviated from the route he should have taken in patrolling his beat, but will assume that to be true. The question we shall discuss is whether the policeman by leaving the beat assigned to him and by going upon another public street of the city forfeited his right to claim damages on account of a negligent defect in the public street over which he was thus traveling.

[1] The wrong, if any, which the city committed against the plaintiff, was the violation of a duty on the city's part (howsoever imposed, if imposed by any rule of law) to keep the place where the plaintiff was hurt free from latent, harmful things jeopardizing his right of personal security. Duties usually arise from the law attaching to relationships. A single relationship between the parties may impose a duty upon the one in favor of the other; but it is also true that the same duty as to the same thing at the same time may be imposed upon the same one person in favor of the same other person by reason of two or more different relationships simultaneously existing between the parties. Further, cases arise in which the relationship between the parties is twofold (or even multifold), but in which some particular duty is owing by the one party to the other under only one of the relationships; also, there are cases where a person having the same duty generally owing him by another person under two concurrent relationships has forfeited his right of action for a breach of the duty as respects one of the relationships, but not as respects the other. If two relationships exist, the plaintiff has a right of action for damages arising from the breach of a duty owed to him thereunder, whether owed under only one or under both of them; and, if the duty is generally owing under both, he may successfully maintain his action, notwithstanding that he has forfeited his rights to invoke the breach of duty as a cause of action so far as one of the relationships is concerned, provided he has not also forfeited it as to the other.

[2] The trial court in this case looked upon the plaintiff's cause of action as arising under the relationship of master and servant. Generally speaking, the master must not expose the servant to latent dangers which he in ignorance of them is likely to encounter in the line of the performance of the duty assigned to him. A duty to warn exists in such cases; and a failure to warn, followed by hurt therefrom to the servant, usually gives a cause of action. But if it appears that the servant would not have been injured if he had pursued his duty according to the instructions given him, and that he was hurt while materially deviating from the line of his duty, he is not in a position to invoke the failure to warn or the undisclosed existence of the latent danger as a cause of action, so far as the relationship of master and servant is concerned; and, if there does not exist between the parties some other relationship adequate to impose the duty and to preserve it under the facts, he cannot recover. So in this case, if there were no duty on the city save that of a master, and no right in favor of the policeman save that of a servant, the judgment of the trial court would be correct. In so far as the city and the policeman are to be viewed as master and servant, the city owed to the policeman the duty of not sending him without warning to walk over a route in which there existed a hidden danger, of which the city had actual or constructive knowledge and the policeman had not, whether that danger lay in a public street or not. If the policeman, in violation of instructions, left the route assigned him, and of his own volition took another, and the latent danger was there encountered, he could not in his capacity of employé hold the city liable in the capacity of employer.

However, another relationship existed between the parties—that of municipality and traveler upon the public highway. A duty as to the particular thing by which the plaintiff was hurt exists under the law of that relationship. "Keeping the sidewalks [and public ways] reasonably safe is the duty of a municipal corporation relatively not only to travelers, but to any person lawfully upon a sidewalk [or public way] using it for any purpose for which sidewalks [and public ways] are designed." City of Columbus v. Anglin, 120 Ga. 785 (2), 48 S. E. 318. The plaintiff was a citizen as well as a policeman. As a policeman (or servant) he was not entitled to protection against latent defects in the way over which he passed, unless he confined himself substantially to the route he was instructed to go. As a citizen he was entitled to protection against such defects, no matter where his inclinations took him, provided he confined himself to the public highway.

The fact that he had forfeited his rights to warning and to protection in his capacity of patrolman on duty did not work a forfeiture also of his rights as a citizen lawfully traveling the highway. A person may be lawfully traveling a highway, though at the time of his travel he may be engaged in violating some duty, or even in violating some law. For instance, a person walking orderly down a sidewalk is using the sidewalk lawfully, though he may be violating the law by having a pistol concealed in his pocket. The fact of his having the pistol concealed would not prevent his recovering from the city if he fell on account of a latent defect in the sidewalk and broke his leg. Atlanta Steel Company v. Hughes, 136 Ga. 511, 71 S. E. 728. Suppose that the plaintiff in this case had wholly deserted his beat, and had gone into an entirely different portion of the city for some purpose utterly foreign to his duties as a policeman, and had there suffered injury through a defect in the street, would he be precluded from holding the city liable to him as a citizen? We think not. Suppose a track foreman of a railroad company leaves his accustomed work before his hours of service are over and buys a ticket, and takes passage upon one of the trains of the company for which he is working. The company no longer owes him duty as a servant, but it none the less owes him the same duty it would any other passenger.

Enough has been said to show that we are of the opinion that the court erred in directing a verdict against the plaintiff. In what we have said we have assumed that the ordinary rules of the law of master and servant are generally applicable between a city and one of its policemen, but, before we close this opinion, we wish to say that this assumption has been made only for the purposes of the argument; for, while the point is not before us, we incline to the view that the relation between the city and a policeman is not the ordinary relation of master and servant, but is a special relation in which the public character of the policeman's office is an important factor. Many courts have so held. See City of Galveston v. Hemmils, 72 Tex. 553, 11 S. W. 29, 13 Am. St. Rep. 823, and citations. The governmental function involved in the city's duty of employing policemen presents an element not involved in the ordinary case of employer and employé. Be that as it may, it is well settled that policemen, firemen, and other city employes are entitled to hold the city liable for defects in the streets and other highways on the same general terms as other citizens. An excellent note and collection of cases on the subject is found in 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 748.

On Rehearing.

It is contended in the motion for a rehearing that this court has overlooked the decision in the case of Atlanta, etc., Ry. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 20 S. E. 550, 26 L. R. A. 553, 44 Am. St. Rep. 145, in which the court says (quoting from 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, pp. 411, 412): "In order to maintain an action for a negligent injury, it must appear that there was a legal duty from the person inflicting the injury to the person on whom it was inflicted, and that such duty was violated by a want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant. It is not sufficient that there be a general duty to the public which is violated, but in all civil cases the right to enforce such duty must reside in the individual injured because of a duty due him from his injurer, or he cannot recover." We think that a careful reading of our opinion previously filed will show that we have not overlooked this doctrine. We took then, and now take, the view that the city owed to Kennedy a duty residing in him in his individual capacity as a traveler upon the highway, the duty of keeping the highway reasonably safe, and that, while this is a general duty owing to all the public, it is a specific duty as to each member of the public, when that individual puts himself in such relation as to be able to invoke it in a particular case. The doctrine was applied in the Gravitt Case to the extent of holding that, as to crossing laws, the general duty of giving signals and checking the train, which the railway companies owe, could not be invoked by one who was not attempting to use the crossing, but who was injured at another place. Or, to state it differently, the general duty imposed upon railroad companies as to crossings exists only in favor of such members of the general public as are using or are attempting to use the public crossing, and that Gravitt, who was not using or attempting to use the crossing, had no right to invoke as negligence a failure of the railroad company to comply with the crossing law. So, in this case, if Kennedy had not been a traveler upon the highway, he could not invoke as negligence the fact that the city had neglected the duty of keeping the highway in repair. The court in the Gravitt Case did not mean to say that, because the duty imposed upon railroad companies as to public crossings is a duty owing to the general public, an individual who was about to use the crossing could not claim the benefit of it. Likewise, in this case, we have held that, though the duty owing by the city as to keeping its streets in repair is a general duty owing to all the public, still any member of the public who at the time happens to be lawfully traveling over the particular street can invoke the duty, and that Kennedy was at the time of his injury such a traveler.

KIMBALL v. SMITH, Sheriff. (No. 3,107.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1911.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 121*)—LIABILITIES—FAILURE TO TAKE BOND.

If bail trover process against more than one defendant is placed in the hands of a sheriff for execution, and he finds the property in the possession of one of them, and takes from him a bond with good security in terms of the statute, conditioned for the production of the property or the payment of the eventual condemnation money in accordance with the judgment of the court, he cannot thereafter seize the property, and is consequently relieved from the duty of taking bond from the other defendants, or from arresting them for failure to give bond. The law only requires the sheriff to have before the court either the specific property or a solvent bond standing in the place of it.

Error from City Court of Monroe; A. C. Stone, Judge.

Rule by Sallie Kimball against A. S. Smith, Sheriff. Judgment for defendant in rule, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. H. Felker, for plaintiff in error. Napier & Cox, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Mrs. Kimball instituted trover against Biggs, Hester, and Doss jointly, and made affidavit for the purpose of requiring bail that the property was in the possession of the three defendants. The sheriff executed the bail process by taking from Hester and Doss separate bonds for the eventual condemnation money. It appears that these two had the horse in their possession, and that Biggs did not. No bond was taken from Biggs, nor was he arrested. He was simply served with a copy of the trover suit. He was insolvent. At the trial of the trover case the plaintiff recovered a judgment against Biggs for the value of the property, but the finding of the jury was in favor of the other two defendants. It seems that this result came about by reason of the fact that the plaintiff had sold the horse for which the trover suit was instituted to Biggs under an unrecorded contract or conditional sale, and that Biggs had sold it to the other two defendants, who purchased without notice, so that at the trial of the trover suit Biggs was estopped from denying the plaintiff's title, and even from setting up outstanding title in his codefendants. But these codefendants, not being estopped to deny the plaintiff's title, were released by the judgment. The plaintiff, being unable to make the amount of the judgment out of Biggs on account of his insolvency, brought a rule against the sheriff, claiming damages for the sheriff's neglect to take also from Biggs a bond for the eventual condemnation money.

At first we were under the impression that the sheriff was plainly liable; that, where he has bail process against three defendants in the same suit, he must take either joint or several bonds with ample security from them, and from all of them; and that, since he had failed to do this in the present case, the trial court properly held him liable. On maturer reflection we have come to the conclusion that our former opinion was incorrect. A trover suit is somewhat of a mixed action under the practice of this state. The plaintiff in it has the option of recovering either the possession of the specific property or of taking damages for the unlawful conversion of it; that is, the value of the property. If the plaintiff has reason to fear that the specific property will be put beyond the reach of the court's processes, he may make additional affidavit alleging that the defendant had the possession, custody, or control of the property at the time of the making of the affidavit, and that there is danger of his eluding it or carrying it away. Whereupon it becomes the duty of the officer to take such steps as will be adequate to have before the court at the time of the final trial of the case either the specific property or what is its legal equivalent—a valid bond, conditioned either for the forthcoming of the property or for the payment of the eventual condemnation money, as the plaintiff may elect.

The law has pointed out the method which the sheriff shall pursue to attain this end. This law is set forth in Civil Code 1910, §§ 5150-5152. The method there outlined for the execution of a bail process is that the sheriff shall first give the defendant opportunity of giving a bond of the nature stated above. If the defendant refuses to give such bond, the sheriff shall seize the property, if he can find it. If he does not get a bond, and if he cannot find the property, he then arrests and imprisons the defendant, for the purpose of compelling him either to produce the property or to give bond. But these steps are to be taken only in the order named. He cannot seize the property if adequate bond be tendered. He cannot arrest the defendant, whether bond be tendered or not, if he can seize the property. As we have said already, the object of the bail process is to bring into the custody of the court the physical property out of the possession of him who holds it at the time the bail process is sued out, or to require a bond which will put the court in a position in which it will be in its power to enforce its process as if the property had been seized. Unquestionably the failure of the sheriff to perform his duty in this regard where bail process has been placed in his hands renders him liable for the money. Edwards v. Harris, 7 Ga. App. 209, 66 S. E. 622, and cases there cited. Now, if the sheriff, having bail process against three distinct defendants in the same case, goes forth to execute it, and finds the property physically held by one of them only, and the person so holding it puts it into the possession of the sheriff, this would be a valid execution of the process on the sheriff's part. Similarly, if this same defendant so possessing and controlling the particular property gives to the sheriff a bond conditioned as the statute requires—that is, either to produce the property or to pay the eventual condemnation money that may be awarded against him because of that possession which he is holding—the sheriff cannot thereafter seize the property, nor can he arrest any one else on the process, for the reason that seizure of the property and arrest of the principal can be exercised only when the sheriff has not taken a bond which stands for the same purposes as would be accomplished by the seizure of the property from the particular person who holds possession of it. If at the trial of the case it turns out that this person who holds the property in his possession was holding it either for himself or for one of the other defendants—that is, if his possession is either his own, or is the legal possession of one of the other defendants—and it further turns out that the plaintiff in the trover suit would be entitled to take that property away from that possession, if the effect of the judgment in the case is to establish the title in the plaintiff carrying with it a right to possession of the property, judgment can be taken upon the bond, though executed by only one of the defendants; and it being a bond for the production of the property, or for the payment of the eventual condemnation money, it is fully sufficient to answer every purpose that could be accomplished if the property were before the court.

To apply the principle to the case before us: If the sheriff, instead of taking bond from the defendant who had the property, had done what is the legal equivalent—that is, had seized the property and had had it before the court for disposition on the trial of the trover case—all the court could have done would have been to restore the property to those defendants who had given the bond, and to enter up a judgment for damages against the defendant Biggs. When the sheriff had the bond of these two defendants before the court, he had what was the exact legal equivalent of the property itself. If it had turned out on the trial of the case that the possession which was held by the two defendants who gave the bond was in any sense the possession of Biggs, the bond would have been answerable for the judgment against Biggs. But the bond was exonerated in this case for the all-sufficient reason that the possession against which the bail process was directed was not the unlawful possession of Biggs, but was the lawful possession of the two defendants who gave the bond, a possession based on a title superior to the plaintiff's. It will be seen, therefore, that a sheriff who does not take bonds from each and all of the defendants himself takes the risk of showing that he took it from one of them who had the property physically in his control, and that this bond, under all the circumstances of the case, was adequate to give the court the same power or control over the property as if the property had been seized under the bail process and was being held by the officer for disposition.

Any other rule than the one we are now announcing would put it in the power of the plaintiff in a trover suit to use the writ most oppressively against innocent persons joined as defendants. In other words, any would-be plaintiff, standing in such relation to a prospective insolvent defendant that the latter could not deny his title to a piece of property in fact held by some third person by a superior title, could, by joining this solvent true owner, compel him to give up his property into the possession of the sheriff, or else procure bond from an insolvent co-defendant against whom the plaintiff would be entitled to take judgment. In rules against sheriffs, the well-established doctrine is that the plaintiff must show injury and damage to himself, as well as neglect of duty on the part of the sheriff. The proximate cause of the plaintiff's loss in this case, under all the facts, was not neglect on the sheriff's part, but was the plaintiff's own lack of title to the property as against the person who held it.

Judgment affirmed.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 20*)—"WILLFUL"—DEFINITION.

The word "willful," as used with relation to penal offenses, means more than "intentional." It means an intentional act done purposely to violate the law (citing 8 Words and Phrases, p. 7471).

Error from City Court of Sylvester; J. B. Williamson, Judge.

I. H. Kendall was convicted of disturbing a public assemblage, and brings error. Affirmed.

Perry, Foy & Monk and J. J. Forehand & Son, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Tipton, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of a violation of section 424 of the Penal Code 1910, which is in the following language: "Any person who shall willfully interrupt or disturb any public school, private school, or Sunday school, or any assemblage or meeting of any such school, lawfully and peacefully held for the purpose of scientific, literary, social, or religious improvement, either within or without the place where such school is usually held, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he brings error.

[1] In so far as the general grounds of the motion for a new trial are concerned, we may content ourselves with the statement that there was evidence to authorize the verdict, and unless some prejudicial error of law appears this court cannot disturb the finding of the jury. The motion for a new trial contained numerous assignments of error, but they involve no novel principle of law of general interest, and with one exception do not demand any elaborate discussion. This one relates to the definition which it is claimed that the court gave to the word "willfully" in the statute which qualifies or characterizes the criminal act of interrupting or disturbing a lawful assemblage of persons therein described. On this subject the court charged as follows: "You will consider whether or not an assembly of the character alleged in the accusation was disturbed, and whether or not it was disturbed in the manner alleged in the accusation (and I mean by that in any of the ways alleged in the accusation), and you will determine whether or not willfully, and if you find that the disturbance was intentional, it would be willfull." The gravamen of the complaint against this charge is that the court defined the word "willfully," in the statute, as entirely synonymous with the word "intentionally," and that this interpretation of the word was too narrow, and was incorrect, because the word "willfully," in the statute, implies something more than intentionally.

[2] We think that the word "willfully," in this criminal statute, and in most criminal statutes, is a stronger word than the word "intentionally," and is broader and more comprehensive in its meaning. It embraces "intentionally" in its meaning, but it means an intentional act committed with an evil design or purpose and without legal justification. In other words, the word "willfull," when used in a criminal statute, means the intentional and deliberate doing of the wrongful act prohibited by the statute. See definitions of the words "willful" and "willfully" in Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, vol. 8, p. 7471 et seq. The facts of this case illustrate fully the import of the word "willfully," as distinguished from the word "intentionally," which we have attempted to show. Here the accused had a difficulty in an assembly of people held for secular purposes. He claims that the difficulty was provoked, and that he was justifiable in his act, so far as the difficulty was concerned; that his purpose was not to disturb the assembly, although he did intentionally do the act which in its consequences disturbed them.

As before intimated, we think the evidence warrants the verdict that he not only intentionally did the act which in its consequences disturbed the assemblage but that he did in fact willfully disturb them; that he did something more than merely engage in a difficulty, in that he designedly and willfully disturbed the people assembled in the schoolhouse; and we think the trial judge, in the instruction excepted to, fully conveyed to the jury the idea that the act of the defendant which would be a violation of the statute was not the committing of the act of disorderly conduct, but was the intentional or willful disturbing of the congregation or assemblage of people. In other words, that he not only intended to participate in the difficulty which in its consequences did disturb the assemblage, but that he went further in willfully acting so as to create a disturbance, and that a broader and stronger definition of the word "willfully," as applicable to this statute, than the word "intentionally," was fully elucidated in the charge. And we therefore conclude that this excerpt from the charge was not subject to the criticism contained in the exception.

LEE v. ATLANTA, B. & A. R. CO.

(No. 3,024.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 29, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 316*)—NEGLIGENCE—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

The relation of principal and agent does not generally arise between employer and employé, when the latter exercises an independent business, and in it is not subject to the immediate direction and control of the employer; and in such cases, where torts are committed by the employé, the employer is not liable under the provisions of section 4414 of the Civil Code of this state. No exception to this rule exists in a case where a chartered railroad company employs another person or corporation, not under its immediate direction and control, to do such work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Burton Smith, for plaintiff in error. Rosser & Brandon, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The suit was for damages alleged to have resulted under the following circumstances: The plaintiff alleged that he was an employé of the defendant company, and was working for it in the capacity of a fireman. At the time he was injured he was working on the line of the defendant's railroad at the trestle named in the petition. The special work in which he and those associated with him were engaged was filling in dirt at the end of the trestle. There were two additional stationary engines on a flat car, and they were used in pulling a plow over the flat cars to scrape dirt from them which had been placed there to fill in the trestle. The steam used in the operation of these stationary engines was furnished by steam pipe connection with the locomotive engine. It was a part of the duty of the petitioner to run the stationary engines. At the time he was injured he turned on the steam at the locomotive and started over to the stationary engines for the purpose of starting them. Immediately after he left the locomotive, a pipe, connecting the locomotive and the stationary engines, blew out, and he was thrown to the ground some distance below and injured. This pipe was alleged to have been defective in certain particulars mentioned. The plaintiff alleged that he was free from fault, and did not know the defective condition of the pipes which exploded. He suffered severe injuries as stated in his declaration.

Upon the trial of the case, after the evidence was all in, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant; and to the judgment so directing the verdict the plaintiff excepted. The undisputed evidence on the trial showed that the work of filling in the trestle in question was being done by the Atlantic & Birmingham Construction Company, a corporation organized by a judgment of the superior court under a contract wherein the construction company agreed with the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company (which will hereafter be referred to as the railroad company) to construct and fully complete its line of road from a point near Warm Springs, in Meriwether county, up to the city of Atlanta, but not into the city itself. The injury occurred at a point at which the construction company, under its contract, was bound to construct the railroad. The plaintiff, at the time of his injury, was an employé of the construction company, and not of the railroad company. He was engaged in and about the work of the construction company, and was not doing any work for the railroad company. His contract of employment was with the construction company. He was paid by the construction company for his services, and the defendant company insisted upon its nonliability, and upon the ground that he was in the employment of an independent contractor, and suffered injuries as a consequence of the negligence of the independent contractor. The railroad company exercised no supervision or control over him or his associates in and about the work of the construction company, and reserved the right only to supervise the work of the construction company to the extent of seeing that it properly complied with its contract. As to all of the other essential ingredients of the case it is assumed, for the purposes of determining this writ of error, that the evidence, otherwise than as above stated, would have justified a recovery for the plaintiff.

The question, then, is whether or not the employer, under the circumstances stated, was liable for the conduct of the independent contractor. Section 4414 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that "the employer generally is not responsible for torts committed by his employé when the latter exercises an independent business, and in it is not subject to the immediate direction and control of the employer." It is insisted, notwithstanding the provisions of this section, which would seem to be conclusive of the nonliability of the defendant, that it could have no application to a railroad company, and that the railroad company could not, by the employment of an independent contractor to construct its roadbed, escape liability for injuries occurring upon its tracks. We do not think this contention well taken. In the first place, the injuries inflicted in this case did not occur as the result of any breach of duty owing by the railroad company to the plaintiff. Relatively to him there could be no implication of such duty as would arise in favor of a passenger, or even of a third person who was injured because of the railroad company permitting a third person to use its tracks, or other special franchises. It owed a duty of safety to its passengers, and a like duty to a third person to guard them against negligence in the operation either of its own trains, or the trains of a third person which it permitted to go upon its tracks. No duty is imposed upon a railroad company by its charter or otherwise to build by any particular means its roadbeds, and there is nothing in our law which prohibits it from committing such work to the hands of an independent contractor. Atlanta & Florida Railroad Company v. Kimberly, 87 Ga. 161, 13 S. E. 277, 27 Am. St. Rep. 231; Fulton County Street Railroad Company et al. v. McConnell, 87 Ga. 756, 13 S. E. 828; Brunswick Grocery Company v. Brunswick & Western Railroad Company, 106 Ga. 270, 32 S. E. 92, 71 Am. St. Rep. 249.

It is perfectly apparent from reading the contract, which is found in the record, that the construction company occupied relatively to the railroad company in question the position of an independent contractor. The railroad company retained no control over the building of the railroad except to see by its appropriate officers that in the construction of the railroad the contract was complied with, and the mere fact that it specified the plans and specifications under which the road was to be built, and that it was to be built to the satisfaction of the railroad company's engineer, did not change the relation, except as between the railroad company and third persons, nor establish any right or duty between the railroad company and the construction company. See Atlanta & Florida Railroad Company v. Kimberly, supra, and Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company v. Hughes, 134 Ga. 75, 67 S. E. 542. See also, Lampton v. Cedartown Co., 6 Ga. App. 147, 64 S. E. 495. In discussing that case, at 6 Ga. App. 149, 64 S. E. 496, Chief Judge Hill says: "When a person lets out work to another to be done by him such person to furnish the labor, and the contractee reserving no control over the work or workmen, the relation of contractor and contractee exists, and not that of master and servant, and the contractee is not liable for the negligent or improper execution of the work by the contractor. This does not mean that the specific work to be done shall not be done according to definite plans and specifications of the employer, or that he may not reserve, through the direction of an architect or an agent, a general supervision to see that the work is properly done according to the plans and specifications, provided the methods and instruments of doing this specific work are left under the exclusive control of the contractor. It is contended in this case that the work was not to be done by an independent contractor, because the owner of the building furnished the material for its construction, and the work was to be done according to the plans and specifications of the architect, and to the satisfaction of the engineer of the owner; in other words, that by these stipulations the owner of the building in question reserved the right to exercise control over the details of the work in question. The injury in this case has no connection with any material that was used, but was purely a casual act of negligence occurring in the course of construction, when the contractor had absolute and entire control of the work. In nearly all cases of independent contractors, the owner or proprietor mutually retains control by a skilled architect, 'not for the purpose of controlling the contractor in his method, but for the purpose of assuring himself that the results enumerated in the specifications of the contract are reached by the contractor step by step as the work progresses.' 2 Thompson on Negligence, par. 41. Nor did the fact that the contractor in this case required that the work be done to the satisfaction of the engineer of the defendant make the case one of master and servant. Certainly it would not prevent one from being an independent contractor that the stipulation in his contract required that his work be done to the satisfaction of the contractee or employer. The Supreme Court of this state has in several cases made an application of the principle of law now under discussion to particular facts. See Harrison v. Kiser, 79 Ga. 588, 4 S. E. 320; Atlanta & Florida Railroad Co. v. Kimberly, 87 Ga. 161, 18 S. E. 277, 27 Am. St. Rep. 231; Ridgeway v. Downing Co., 109 Ga. 591, 34 S. E. 1028."

Nor can it make any difference that the railroad company might have furnished some of the materials for the construction of its roadbed, or hired to the construction company its locomotive for the purpose of pulling its cars. The stationary engines were the property of the construction company itself, and the case of Central Railroad & Banking Company v. Grant, 48 Ga. 417, seems to be conclusive to the effect that these circumstances do not impose a liability upon the defendant company. On page 421, the court, in discussing that case, uses the following language: "In our judgment, under the law defining the liability of the defendant, as a railroad corporation or company, for damage done to persons by the running of the locomotives or cars or other machinery of such company, the defendant was not liable in damages to the plaintiffs for the injury received by them, on the statement of facts contained in the record. The plaintiffs were in the employ of Names, the contractor, under his supervision and direction in the use and management of the mules, car, and driver. The fact that the defendant furnished the mules, car, driver, and trestle, under the contract with Names to construct the embankment, did not make it liable for the negligence or carelessness of Names in operating and managing the same in the performance of his contract."

Upon principle we are unable to distinguish between that case and this. We do not find, therefore, any authority for the proposition that a railroad company occupies a position different from that which would be occupied by any other employer relative to an independent contractor, and it is only necessary to read section 4415 of the Civil Code of 1910 to see that the facts of the present case do not bring the employer in this case within any of the exceptions named in that section. Upon the undisputed testimony in the case, the non-liability of the defendant company is apparent, and the court did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant.

A number of exceptions were taken to rulings excluding evidence, but, since the evidence admitted could not have changed the result in any way, it is unnecessary to discuss them, further than to say that no error was committed in excluding the evidence which was rejected.

Judgment affirmed.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, for plaintiff in error. Slaton & Phillips, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. Armour & Co. brought suit against Bluthenthal & Bickart for $3,066.98, the price of a car load of hotel supplies alleged to have been shipped and delivered to the Toxaway Hotel Company upon a written guaranty of payment therefor made by the defendants to the plaintiff. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for $1,583.04 principal, besides interest. The plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the amount of the verdict, filed a motion for a new trial, and the case is here on exceptions to the judgment overruling the motion.

The plaintiff in error insists that it proved all the items of the bill of particulars attached to the petition, and therefore was entitled to a verdict for the full amount of the suit, and it specifically assigns error on the ruling of the trial judge in directing the jury to find against its claim as to two items of the account, and contends, also, that the verdict was further improperly reduced in amount because of the finding of the jury of a payment of $1,000 on the account; it being insisted that there is no legal evidence as to this payment, and that the ruling admitting the testimony in reference thereto was erroneous. It is conceded that the plaintiff proved all the items of the account except the two which the court instructed the jury the plaintiff failed to prove. The first of these two items is the first item in the bill of particulars, and is as follows: "5 21/2 Chix loaf 10 95 $9.50." The second item is the fifteenth in the bill of particulars, and is as follows: "40 Bl. Livers 2934 16 $469.44." The witness relied upon by the plaintiff to prove these items testified as follows: "Now, there are two items here that are not absolutely correct. The first item on the first line of the account is '5 21/2 chicken loaf.' There is no such package as that. That should be five cases, 24 cans, 2 pounds each, which means two dozen halves. On the fifteenth line there is 40 livers noted here, 2,934 pounds. That should be loins, beef loins. Livers at 16 cents a pound. That is clearly a mistake. The amount of $3,066 is right, and has not been paid. With the two changes to which I have referred, the items of the account are correct."

As to the first item, we think that there was no material variance between the allegation and the proof. There was no special demurrer to this item, although somewhat indefinite, and the evidence of this witness explaining this item of the account was that what was meant by "chicken loaf" was 5 cases, 24 cans, 2 pounds each, $9.50. The evidence shows that there were 5 cases of chicken loaf, each case containing 24 cans, 2 pounds each. In other words, the only variance in the allegations and the proof is that there were 24 cans, instead of 21, contained in the 5 cases of chicken loaf. The price, however, claimed for this item on the account, is $9.50. We cannot think that the slight variance in the number of cans contained in the five cases between the allegation in the bill of particulars and the proof in support of that item of the bill of particulars is at all material, and we think that the court erred in holding that the plaintiff failed to prove this item in the bill of particulars, and in instructing the jury to that effect.

As to the item in the bill of particulars claiming $469.44 for 40 barrels of livers, when the proof showed that there were no such livers furnished, and that this item should have been 40 barrels of loins, instead of livers, we do not think there was any evidence proving this item of the account, and the court properly so instructed the jury. Clearly a suit for 40 barrels of livers is not proved by showing that no livers were furnished, but instead of livers, the 40 barrels of loins were furnished. It would be as logical to claim that a man, sued for a horse of a certain value, could be held liable for the horse, although the evidence showed that it was a cow, and not a horse, which he had purchased. As to this item the plaintiff should have amended to meet the proof. Failing to amend, he cannot be heard to complain that the judge instructed the jury to the effect that proof of the sale of 40 barrels of loins did not support the allegation in the bill of particulars that 40 barrels of livers were sold.

[1] The burden was upon the plaintiff to prove every item in the bill of particulars substantially as alleged. The defendant is only called upon to meet the allegations set out in the bill of particulars, and presumptively he prepares to meet the items of the bill of particulars, and not others that may be proved against him, and he is entitled to demand that the evidence prove the items of the bill of particulars as alleged. So much for these two items of the account set out in the bill of particulars, which the trial judge directed the jury to disregard, because they were not proved.

What is here written relating to the item of 40 barrels of livers claimed in the bill of particulars as part of the account is the view entertained by a majority of the court. The writer does not fully concur in this opinion. No objection was made by the defendants to the evidence of the plaintiff explaining and correcting this item. It seems to me, therefore, that in the absence of such objection there was a tacit admission that the item as written in the bill of particulars was only a clerical error, and should have been "loins, beef loins," instead of "livers." Neither was there any denial of the allegation as corrected that the "beef loins" had been delivered and receipted by the Toxaway Hotel Company as among the contents contained in the car of hotel supplies payment for which was covered by the guaranty. In the absence of any objection to the evidence explaining and correcting this item of the bill of particulars, or any question that the "loins, beef loins," had been in fact delivered to the hotel company, I think no amendment was necessary, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover this item of the account. The contrary view, it seems to me, is a too strict adherence to the technical rules of pleading at the expense of substantial right. It presents a situation where the plaintiff loses entirely payment for its property, which was admittedly delivered to the original debtor, for any subsequent suit for the amount would probably be res adjudicata.

[2] The next point insisted upon by the plaintiff in error is that the jury improperly allowed a credit of $1,000 to the defendants. It was insisted that there was no legal evidence before the jury proving this credit. The Toxaway Hotel Company was the original debtor, the payment of whose debt was guaranteed by the defendants. The president of that company testified in substance that on September 10, 1906, the Toxaway Hotel Company made a payment of $1,000 to Armour & Co., the plaintiff; that this payment was for material which Armour & Co. had furnished to the Toxaway Hotel Company; and that the payment was subsequent to the furnishing of the car load of supplies by Armour & Co. to the hotel company in pursuance of the written guaranty made to it by the defendants. While it is not absolutely clear, in view of the other testimony of the president of the Toxaway Hotel Company, that his company was indebted to Armour & Co. on various other accounts contracted during the year 1906 in addition to the car load of supplies for which the suit was brought, yet the question whether or not the $1,000 was paid for the car load of supplies, or paid on some other account, was issuable, under the evidence. If it was not paid on the car load of supplies when it was claimed as a credit by the defendants, the plaintiff should have made it clear to the jury that this credit was not properly applicable to the car load of supplies, because it was a payment for other articles.

But it is further insisted that there was no legal evidence before the jury of the payment of the $1,000 by the Toxaway Hotel Company on any account to Armour & Co. It is insisted that the testimony as to this payment, in the light of the cross-examination of the witness relied upon to prove the payment, was illegally admitted in evidence by the court over the objection of plaintiff. On cross-examination this witness testified that the payment was made by a check sent in a letter; that that was the usual and customary way adopted by the Toxaway Hotel Company in the payment of all of its debts; that the payment of the $1,000 was not made directly to any agent or officer in person of Armour & Co., but was simply a check inclosed in a letter and sent by the hotel company to Armour & Co. It is insisted that the letter and the check were the best evidence of the payment, and that the testimony admitted was secondary and without probative value. We do not agree with this view. The witness testified positively that the payment of the $1,000 was made. It was wholly immaterial whether it was made by a check or in currency, and the positive statement of the witness that this payment was made carries with it the necessary implication that, if it was made by a check, the check was accepted in payment, and that the check was paid. Besides, it is well settled that the fact of payment may be proved by parol testimony, where the payment was made by a check or promissory note, without producing such check or note, or accounting for their nonproduction. Fisher v. Jones Co., 93 Ga. 717, 21 S. E. 152. It may be further stated that the witness who testified positively as to this payment was not only the president of the original debtor, the Toxaway Hotel Company, but he was introduced by the plaintiff, and we think, for the reasons stated, the evidence was properly admitted to the jury, even without the production of the letter or the check; and, as before stated, the question as to whether the payment was made on the account sued for, or on some other account, was issuable.

[3] The next question raised by plaintiff in error is that the trial judge erred in charging in effect that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that no payment had been made—in other words, to prove affirmatively that the account was unpaid—and in refusing to charge a written request that payment was a matter of defense, and the burden of showing payment was on the defendant. The court charged, in effect, that the burden was upon the plaintiff to make out its case by showing that the goods sued for were sold and delivered, and, furthermore, that they had not been paid for. Ordinarily, where suit is brought for goods sold, it would be sufficient to shift the burden for the plaintiff to show that the goods were sold and delivered, and in such case payment is an affirmative defense, which should be set up and proved by the defendant, and this is the ruling in the case of Christian v. Bryant, 102 Ga. 561, 27 S. E. 666, relied upon by the plaintiff in error. But this is a suit, not against the original debtor, but against the guarantor; and if the guarantor, the defendant, had made any payment on the account, the burden would be upon the guarantor to show the fact of payment. But where suit is brought against the guarantor, the plaintiff must show the contract of guaranty and refusal to pay the account by the principal debtor, and, ordinarily, notice by the creditor to the maker of the guaranty, before the goods were sold and delivered, that the same were accepted, and should allege that on the faith of such guaranty the goods represented by the account sued on were sold and delivered as requested in the guaranty. Small v. Claxton, 1 Ga. App. 83, 57 S. E. 977.

Certainly in all cases, whether the contract of guaranty be absolute or conditional, the plaintiff must show, in order to make out a prima facie case, his contract of guaranty, that the goods were furnished in pursuance of the contract of guaranty, and that the debt has not been paid by the original debtor, for only under these circumstances would the guarantor be liable on his contract. In other words, in cases of suits against guarantors, the nonpayment of the debt by the principal debtors is a material fact necessary to constitute the plaintiff's cause of action, and it must be alleged in the petition and proved as a part of the plaintiff's case. 16 Enc. Pleading and Practice, p. 932; State v. Peterson, 142 Mo. 523, 39 S. W. 453, 40 S. W. 1094. In other words, the foundation of the suit against the guarantor on a contract of guaranty is the failure of the principal debtor to pay the debt guaranteed; for only in the event of such failure could there be any liability on the guaranty. 30 Cyc. 1265. We conclude, therefore, that the trial judge did not err in instructing the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff in this case to allege and prove that no part of the account had been paid by the original debtor, and that this burden was upon the plaintiff, whether the guaranty was conditional or absolute.

This case has been twice before this court, and in view of the fact that the only error of the trial judge was an instruction to the jury not to allow the $9.50 for the items of the bill of particulars referred to in the former part of this opinion, we think there should be an end to the litigation; and, while we cannot direct that the judgment below be increased in amount, we think that the defendant in error in this case should be allowed the privilege of paying the $9.50, and we therefore decline to grant a new trial, if the defendant, when the remittitur is filed, will pay to the plaintiff the $9.50 and interest thereon. But, if the defendant refuses to accede to this, a new trial must be granted.

Judgment affirmed conditionally.

PRUDENTIAL INS. CO. OF AMERICA v. CHESTNUT. (No. 3,043.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INSURANCE (§ 367*)—LIFE POLICIES—CONSTRUCTION.

Under the facts presented, the policy of insurance was in force at the date of the death of the insured, and the court did not err in directing the verdict in favor of the beneficiary.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by T. R. Chestnut against the Prudential Insurance Company of America. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McDaniel, Alston & Black, for plaintiff in error. Moore & Pomeroy, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The case has been to the court previously, and, as many of the facts are stated in the opinion then delivered (8 Ga. App. 246, 68 S. E. 952), they will not be repeated here, but this opinion should be read in connection with the former opinion. On that hearing (which was upon demurrer) it appeared that the quarterly premium due December 21, 1908, had been paid. On the evidence coming in, it appeared that the last quarterly premium paid was the one due September 21, 1908. The further facts necessary to an understanding of the case here presented may be summarized as follows: The policy was dated June 21, 1906. The premiums were payable quarterly on the 21st of June, September, December, and March. They were paid up to and including September 21, 1908. The insured died July 8, 1909. The provisions as to extended insurance in the event of a lapse of the policy for non-payment of premiums are as follows: If the policy has been in force for 1 full year, an extension of 60 days from the lapse; if for 2 full years, 120 days from the lapse; if for 3 full years, 1 year and 177 days from date of last payment of premium. It is also stated that, if the premiums are paid in quarterly installments, "due allowance" will be made for that portion of the year's premium which has been made. The court directed a verdict in the plaintiff's favor.

The record contains the testimony of Mr. Samuel Barnett, an insurance actuary. His testimony so clearly shows that the policy was in force at the time of the death of the insured, and at the same time so lucidly explains the nature of such contracts as the one before us, that we deem it advantageous to the profession to set forth extracts from his testimony in lieu of any extended discussion on our part. Among other things, Mr. Barnett testified as follows:

"I am an insurance actuary and an insurance lawyer. The duties of an actuary are to do the mathematical work of a life insurance company, including the calculation of premiums and the reserves on policies, and everything in detail, the mathematical part and all about that part of it, and, to a large extent, the legal part of the work which bears on insurance. Practically, I have been all my life at this actuarial work. I have done this kind of work for eight or ten or more insurance companies. I have studied in Europe, and made this work a life study. I am familiar with the methods of calculating reserve and expenses on insurance, and other provisions of life insurance policies. I am familiar with the basis upon which all companies figure—not the Prudential Insurance Company specially, but all companies. There is only one way in which values under a policy can be calculated. The Prudential Insurance Company advertises itself as following the American Experience Tables of Mortality, at 3 per cent. interest. Now, if they do follow the American Experience Tables at 3 per cent., I know how they make their calculations. Three per cent. reserve means that the calculations are made upon the Mortality Table and expected interest rate of 3 per cent. It means a certain reserve laid aside each year at 3 per cent. would meet the policy when it matures.

"The component parts of a premium are, first, the mortality; second, the interest rate; and, third, the expense. The premiums accumulate the reserve; the reserve comes out of the premium. When the premium is first paid, it is made up of nothing except reserve and expense. Leave out the expense, then the uses to which a premium is put are simply to meet the mortality losses as they accrue. Now, when a premium is paid, all the net part of it is reserve at the time it is paid. You can call it reserve for mortality, for the company has got to pay the claim, and therefore you can say, in a certain sense, it is for mortality. The accumulated premium that the policy carries is all the company has to pay anything with, extended insurance, or paid-up insurance, or mortality, or anything else. Premiums are paid from time to time; but it is utterly impossible, when you pay premiums, to say how much is for mortality, how much for surrender value, or how much for anything else. The object of all these premiums is to meet the conditions as they arise along in the future, whatever they may be, and the premiums should be sufficient for that purpose. The surrender values at the end of the third year do not represent the entire reserve on the policy. So far as that part of it is concerned, it is arbitrary. I am inclined to think that the 60 days' extension at the end of the first year is an arbitrary value. I haven't figured it. I think the 120 days at the end of the second year is an arbitrary value.

"When the first premium was paid on this policy, that premium had to pay, first, an agent's commission. The company has to pay an agent's commission. If they don't get it from that first premium, they have got to get it somewhere else. I don't know, as to the Prudential Insurance Company specially; but when the first premium on that policy was paid, this premium of $33, a certain part of that premium went first for agents' commissions. If you ask me the general custom, I can state it. All I know is the general custom. I don't know whether the Prudential paid commissions on the first year's premium. All I know is the general custom. I can only know from my general knowledge that a commission was paid on the first year's premium. If you ask me if I know a general practice, or if I know it in a general way, as a general custom, then I say I do know. I know it from general knowledge. I do not know it from any special knowledge concerning the Prudential Insurance Company. The doctor's medical examination fee was not taken out of the first year's premium as such. Those things have to be paid, but I don't say they would take it out of the first year's premium. They paid the doctor something, but I don't say they took it out of the first year's premium. A certain amount has to be paid for office expenses. If there isn't enough to cover those things, then they have got to go outside and get it. They have a certain amount to cover those things.

"There is no such thing as theoretical reserve, distinct from legal. The reserve is a liability against the company, and the company has got to put it up. The company on full legal reserve basis on usual expenses has got to borrow from some other source to put up the reserve at the end of the first year. The same thing is true at the end of the second year. If the premiums are not sufficient to put up that reserve, they have to go somewhere and get it. No company on full legal reserve on ordinary expenses, after they pay the agents' commissions, and the medical examiners' fees, and the home office expenses, has anything left at the end of the first year, out of the first premium. As a rule, there cannot be much reserve saved out of first premium at the end of the first year. There can be reserve saved out of the premiums at the end of the second year. At the end of the second year, there may be saved as a rule in the neighborhood of a quarter of the premium. I can tell what actual reserve saved there would have been on this policy at the end of the second year, if you will let me know what the expenses of the company are; otherwise, I would have to go into an elaborate calculation of the expense. In order to tell, I would have to know what the commissions were, and what the medical examiner's fee was, and what the home office expenses were, and what the renewal commission was, out of the second year's premium.

"In reference to what the first half of the third year's premium purchased, and the results arrived at by me, I will have to make a little explanation there. The premiums on life insurance policies are all considered to be paid annually, in advance. All calculations are made by all companies on that basis, and there is strictly no such thing recognized as semiannual payments of premium, or quarterly payments of premium; but the policy either goes into a new policy year, or it does not. The company, for the accommodation of the policy holder, frequently allows quarterly payments, or semiannual payments; but technically the company is in that policy year when it accepts a quarter payment or half payment, and all settlements are made as of the end of the year, whenever the policy gets into that year at all. The surrender values are all based upon the results at the end of the year, provided the first quarter is accepted by the company, and it gets into that year at all. Technically speaking, the whole premium is considered paid, and the company is considered to make an extension and a loan of the unpaid parts of the premium. They have the technical name of 'deferred premiums.' A deferred premium is simply a part of the year's premium, annual premium, which has not been paid, so that, strictly speaking, there is no such thing in insurance business at all as quarterly or semiannual premiums; nothing except annual premiums.

"If a man dies within the life of a policy, after the payment of two quarterly premiums, as to whether the company would deduct the balance of the year's premium, the company considers the unpaid quarters as debts due the company, and would deduct them. Whenever a policy goes into a year, the whole of the premium has got to be paid by the policy holder. If he is alive, he pays it; if he dies, the company deducts it. Whenever a company gets into the year, it carries the policy over to the end of the year. The payment of the first two quarters, therefore, carried this policy to the end of the third policy year, and entitles the policy holder to the extended insurance allowed at that time; in the meantime the policy holder being compelled to account to the company for those two unpaid quarters, that being the universal rule among life insurance companies. The two quarters paid on this third year entitled the policy holder to an interpolation between the end of the second year and the end of the third year, and that interpolation will carry the policy 331 days from the middle of the third year; that is, from December 21, 1908, would carry the policy 331 additional days, clear over into the third year, to December of the third year. I don't mean exactly over to the middle of the third year on that policy, from December 21, 1908. Strictly speaking, it ought not to be interpolated exactly that way. It ought to be interpolated by making due allowance, by grading; instead of 331 days, it ought to be about 325 or 326 days. Still it would carry it over the date of death, and it is not necessary to go into that question more accurately.

"It is not exactly proportionate. Just like compound interest. Compound interest is interest on interest, and it don't grow exactly in a straight line. There is no use going into that. It don't make any difference, but amounts to a few days. I think the words 'due allowance' under that policy have a recognized meaning among insurance companies—recognized or special meaning. I don't mean the exact words 'due allowance' in themselves have, but the interpolation of those values between that time has a very distinct meaning among actuaries in insurance. The word 'interpolation' means this: Those benefits are not given except at the end of a distinct year. Now, suppose something happens in between, interpolation is the method of arriving at what is the correct value to the assured upon this intermediate date, and that is a meaning thoroughly recognized in insurance, and it is in following that method of interpolation that I come to that conclusion.

"From the standpoint of the insurance company, the meaning of the clause in the policy, 'If the premiums on this policy are paid in quarterly or semiannual installments, due allowance will be made in computing benefits, in proportion to the full year's premium,' is where benefits are allowed at the end of a certain year, and for some reason those benefits have to be paid at intermediate periods, then 'due allowance' means the assignment of the correct benefit, according to the same law, for those intermediate periods. That means that, if the third year's premium as a whole purchased a year and 177 days of extended insurance, the first two quarters of that year's premium would purchase practically one-half of that additional extended insurance compared with the second year. It would be a little less than one-half, not much less than one-half—a few days, no more probably than six. In determining what benefits, if any, the half of the third year's premium purchased, I would base my calculation on the interval between the second and third year. If the third year's premium purchased three years of extended insurance, and the second year's premium, as such, purchased two years of extended insurance, then the half of the third year's premium, in determining what extended insurance that half purchased, would be based upon what the whole of the third year's premium purchased. It is true that each year stands to itself in the calculation of this extended insurance and cash surrender values in the policy. Each year is a separate calculation in a certain sense.

"Now, of course, the policy year determines what the amount will be. The second year would be calculated independently, or the third year independently, and the fourth year independently. These independent figures are not strictly added onto the separate purchases for the preceding year in getting the total benefit beyond the year you are working on. The policy is not extended each year the same way exactly proportionately. The extended values for each year are figured by themselves. They don't run the same from year to year. If any allowance whatever is to be made for one-half or one-third of a year, it must be based on what the whole of what that particular year's premium would purchase. The results of the end of the third year would not be based upon the results which may have been obtained on the first or second year's premiums. The results of the first or second year could not constitute the same basis of calculation. The additional value would be based upon the results at the end of the third year. One-half of the third year's premium in this policy would purchase within five or six days of one-half of the total extended insurance specified in the policy. Values are not based upon each separate year's premium. Values are based upon a review of the whole situation, from beginning to end. Values are based, at the end of each year, upon the accumulated reserve at the end of each year; that is, they ought to be, and theoretically they are. If there is any value at the end of the third year, it is based upon the reserves at the end of that year. If there is no reserve at the end of the first year, the policy has no value. It could not have. If there is no reserve at the end of the second year, the policy has no value at the end of the second year, technically. If there is no reserve at the end of two and a half years—The only way, I can place a value on a policy, either cash surrender value, loan value, or extended insurance value, is knowing what the reserve was at a certain time, at which I undertake to figure their value. I would have to know what the value was at the end of the first year to get the extended insurance at that time, provided the extended insurance was based upon the reserve; and it ought to be based upon the reserve. All surrender values are based upon reserve, or ought to be. True value is based upon the reserve at the end of the first year; but the surrender value, or extended value, or loan value, may be more or less than the true value of a policy. We have to know what the reserve is, before we can know what the reserve will buy. I can tell you what the reserve was on this policy, in dollars and cents. I have that at 3 per cent. I can tell you at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. in a few minutes. I can figure it. What the expenses are, the first year's commissions, the medical examiner's fee, the expenses of the home office, and the second year's renewal premium wouldn't have anything to do with it.

"There is no actual reserve, independent of the legal reserve. The law makes the reserve. The reserve of a policy is what is called the 'legal reserve,' and that is the legal reserve, and that is based on the American Experience Tables and the interest rate assumed by the company, and it is not a question of whether the company has actually that reserve on hand, or not. All insurance is written on the basis of annual premiums. Quarterly premiums and semiannual premiums are not recognized. As a matter of calculation, they don't calculate values on them. The company considers the full premium paid, if they run the policy on quarterly payments, and that they have loaned the policy holder the rest of the money.

"No extension value is granted on premiums, but it is granted on reserve entirely. The premium has nothing to do with extended insurance. The extension is based upon the reserve as the basis of calculation; that is, it ought to be. The reason extended insurance at the end of each year varies is because the reserve varies at the end of each year. In dollars and cents, the reserve on this policy on December 21, 1908, was $23.50. That reserve would carry the policy beyond July, 1909; that is, the reserve the company ought to have had. If you want me to go a little more accurately into that reserve, I may correct it this way, because there is what we call 'intermediate reserve.' You should add to that figure which I have given one-half of what is called 'pure premium.' You had better put it that way, to get it accurately."

Objection was made to certain parts of Mr. Barnett's testimony, on the ground that he was dealing with unambiguous details of the contract, and was attempting to explain matters that stood in no need of expert interpretation. Even if this objection were abstractly valid, the error complained of is harmless, as, in our opinion, he interpreted the contract correctly, and no harm was done in merely taking his advice.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHNSON v. KLASSETT. (No. 3,040.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 11, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 44*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY—SPLITTING CAUSE OF ACTION.

A running book account, all the items of which have matured at the time of the suit, cannot be split into separate parts, without the consent of the defendant, for the purpose of bringing each part within the jurisdiction of the justice's court; but the account constitutes one demand, and all the items thereof must be included in a single suit. If the running account, thus indivisible, is divided into separate parts, a recovery upon one part would ordinarily be a bar to a subsequent action for any items of the account not included within the first suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 168; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§§ 595, 720*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

Where a running account containing debits and credits is divided into two parts, and a suit is brought on each part, and to the first suit a plea to the jurisdiction is filed in the court in which the suit originated, on the ground that the account has been improperly split into two parts for the purpose of giving the court jurisdiction, which it otherwise would not have of the entire account, and this plea is decided against the defendant on the necessary ground that the account was as a matter of law divided and he acquiesces in such adverse decision, although the decision was erroneous, he is estopped from renewing the same objection to the second suit brought against him for the items of the account not included within the first suit.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by R. S. Johnson against A. Klassesett. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The facts upon which the questions arise in this record, substantially stated, are as follows: Klassesett bought groceries from Johnson as needed, agreeing to pay for them by the week, and for some time carried out this agreement; but he fell behind in his payments, and owed Johnson about $130 on a running account for the years 1905 and 1906. Johnson split the account into two parts, including the items for 1905 in one part, and the items for 1906 in another part, and brought two suits in a justice's court against Klassesett for the separate parts of the account. Both suits were carried to the superior court by appeal. When the suit for sixty odd dollars, including the items for 1906, was reached for trial in the superior court, the defendant filed a plea alleging that the plaintiff had split a solid account in order to bring it within the jurisdiction of the justice's court, and that this was unauthorized by law. This plea seems not to have been sustained in the superior court, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for the full amount of the suit. Subsequently the appeal in the other suit, involving the items for 1905, was dismissed in the superior court, and the plaintiff sued again for these items in the justice's court, and to this suit a plea of res judicata was filed, under section 4335 of the Civil Code of 1910, setting up the judgment in the first suit in the superior court as an adjudication of the same subject-matter, and insisting that the items included in this judgment were identical with those in the suit then pending. When this case was reached for trial in the justice's court, the plaintiff, through his attorney, confessed judgment in open court for the defendant, and thereafter he entered an appeal from that judgment to a jury in the same court. When the appeal came on to be heard, the defendant made two motions before the magistrate: First, that the court dismiss the appeal, on the ground that it was illegal and void because the defendant had filed a plea in bar to the suit, which, if well pleaded, precluded the plaintiff from recovery for all time, and the plaintiff had made a solemn admission in judicio that this plea was well pleaded, and therefore neither an appeal nor a certiorari would lie. Second, that the magistrate direct the jury to sign up a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the defendant had filed a plea in bar and the plaintiff had confessed a judgment in favor of the defendant in open court, and this admission in judicio was conclusive between the parties, and, although the technical right of appeal existed, it could avail the plaintiff nothing, and the only verdict that could be lawfully rendered under the facts was a verdict sustaining the plea in bar. The court overruled both of these motions, and the case proceeded to trial before the jury.

The plaintiff testified, in proof of his account, that in 1905 he opened up an account with the defendant, who at that time said that "he could pay by the week, and would pay by the week," and the plaintiff sold him groceries, charging them to his account with this understanding, and that for a while the defendant did pay by the week, but finally got behind, and that the account sued on was just, true, correct, and unpaid. The defendant introduced no evidence attacking the correctness of the account, but introduced a certified copy from the record showing the other suit for the account of 1906 and the filing of the plea in bar. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of the suit, $87.50, and the defendant sued out a writ of certiorari, which was sustained by the judge of the superior court, who thereupon entered a final judgment in favor of the defendant; and to review this judgment a writ of error is brought to this court.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The questions of law raised by the facts in this case seem never to have been distinctly decided by our Supreme Court; but the principle involved has been before the court on several occasions, and we think is embraced in section 4389 of the Civil Code of 1910, which declares that: "If a contract be entire, but one suit can be maintained for a breach thereof; but if it be severable, or if the breaches occur at successive periods in an entire contract (as where money is to be paid by installments), an action will lie for each breach; but all the breaches occurring up to the commencement of the action must be included therein." It is true that this section relates by its terms to breaches of a contract. But in the case of Floyd v. Cox, 72 Ga. 147, the Supreme Court construed a running account, continuing through several consecutive years, where it was added up at the end of each year, the credits subtracted, and the balance carried forward to the next year, as one entire claim, "but one account and one indebtedness." In Thompson v. McDonald, 84 Ga. 5, 10 S. E. 448, which was a suit on an account, it was held that the "account resulting from a single contract cannot be split up into two causes of action, the whole being mature when the first action was brought." That was a suit brought by the plaintiff for certain lumber which had been bought by the defendant, and on the trial of the case certain of the items of lumber claimed to have been furnished were stricken from the bill of particulars, and the court held that there could be no recovery in the second suit, on the ground that when the first suit was brought the items now sued for, as well as the rest of the general account, were due, and that, having voluntarily withdrawn these items from the account, a second suit could not be brought for them; the rule being that all breaches of a contract up to the time of bringing the suit must be in one action. Macon & Augusta R. R. Co. v. Garrard, 54 Ga. 327; Evans v. Collier, 79 Ga. 319, 4 S. E. 266. In the case of Atlanta Elevator Co. v. Fulton Bag & Cotton Mills, 106

Ga. 427, 32 S. E. 541, it was held that a creditor cannot bring an action against his debtor for an amount admitted to be due upon an account resulting from a single contract, the whole debt being mature when the suit is brought, and afterwards maintain a second action for the balance alleged to be due on the same account in excess of the amount originally sued for.

The whole question resolves itself into this: Was the general running account against the defendant a divisible demand, which could be separated at the will of the plaintiff and collected by several actions? If the running account was an entire and indivisible demand, the judgment in the suit for the account due in 1906 was a good plea in bar to the account for 1905; for, at the time of this second suit for 1905, all the items of the account were matured and past due. The case of Parris v. Hightower, 76 Ga. 631, is relied upon by plaintiff in error. In that case, however, it seems that there was an express agreement that the account for goods sold on the same day should be divided into four distinct parts due on different dates, and in view of this agreement the Supreme Court held that the plaintiff had the option to bring separate suits on each portion of the account, or to unite them. In a well-considered case by the Supreme Court of Iowa, Electric Co. v. Electric Co., 134 Iowa, 665, 112 N. W. 181, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529, it was held that the sale of goods, although at different times and upon different orders, payment for all of which has matured, constitutes but a single demand, and separate suits based upon each distinct order and sale cannot be maintained, although in itself a complete transaction; and a recovery upon one such order and sale is a bar to an action upon the other sales then due. And in speaking for the court the learned justice says: "The proposition that a continuous book account is entire, and cannot without agreement of the parties be split into separate and distinct demands to form a basis for several suits, is one which has general recognition by the authorities, and is no longer open to question"—citing a great many authorities in support of this proposition. All of these authorities uphold the contention that an account of several items, all of which are due and payable, constitutes but one demand, and if the party to whom the account is due sees fit to bring suit for a part thereof and recovers judgment, such recovery will be a bar to any further suit for the remainder of the claim. See, also, to the same effect, Buck v. Wilson, 113 Pa. 423, 6 Atl. 97; Hughes v. Dundee Trust & Mortgage Co. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 831, and many cases there cited.

All of these cases are based upon the principle that both law and equity abhor a multiplicity of suits, and will not permit a plaintiff to divide the items of an account then due for the purpose of harassing the defendant and subjecting him to unnecessary suits. The only just and sound rule—a rule just to both parties—is to compel the plaintiff, where all of the items of the account are due when suit is brought on a running account, to include the whole account in a single suit. In the case now under consideration, if the plaintiff had the right to split the account of $130 into two parts, to bring it within the jurisdiction of the justice's court and unnecessarily harass the defendant with two suits, he could have split the account into weekly amounts and brought any number of suits against the defendant, which would have been an intolerable hardship, and one which the law would not permit. It is therefore clear to our minds that the plaintiff in this case should not have been permitted to divide this account into two parts for the purpose of obtaining jurisdiction in the justice's court, but the suit should have been relegated to the court having jurisdiction of the entire amount. This would not have deprived him of the right of asserting any part of his claim, but would simply have compelled him to assert his entire claim in one suit.

[2] But the proper place to have made this question was the place where it was raised in the superior court when the first case in which a judgment was rendered was tried. Then and there the plaintiff's right to split his account into two parts was directly challenged, and, in our opinion, it being conceded that there was but this one account, this plea should have been sustained; but, through an erroneous view of the law, this plea was decided against the defendant's contention, and judgment was entered up against him accordingly. He submitted to this judgment, and the question was therefore res adjudicata so far as he was concerned, and he could not be subsequently heard, in answer to the second suit, to raise the same question which had been decided by the superior court, and in the decision of which he had acquiesced. There must be an end to litigation, and the end was reached on this point, so far as the defendant was concerned, when the question was raised by the suit tried in the superior court and decided against him, and he submitted to the decision. For this reason we are constrained to hold that the learned judge of the superior court erred in sustaining the certiorari.

The validity of the act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 83) embodied in sections 3444 and 3445 of the Civil Code of 1910, making it a misdemeanor or "to reserve, charge, or take, for any loan, or advance of money or forbearance to enforce the collection of any sum of money, any rate of interest greater than five per cent per month, either directly or indirectly, by way of commission for advances, discount, exchange, the purchase of salary or wages, by notarial or other fees, or by any contract, or contrivance, or device whatever," under which the indictment was framed, is fully upheld in the opinion rendered by the Supreme Court on the questions certified by this court.

2. USURY (§ 149*)—INDICTMENT—DEMURRER.

The demurrers on various grounds, attacking the form and particularly of the indictment, are without merit. The allegations of the indictment in its various counts set forth clearly, distinctly, and with sufficient particularity all the acts complained of charged to be a violation of the statute, not only in the language of the statute itself, but also with such clearness and distinctness as to be easily within the comprehension of the jury, and the judgment overruling the demurrer is affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 592*)—AFFIRMANCE—FAILURE TO BRIEF EVIDENCE.

This case is here on a judgment overruling the motion for a new trial. The evidence on the trial of the case consisted of interrogatories and over 50 pages of documentary evidence, telegrams, letters, etc. Apparently the only effort to brief the evidence by interrogatories was simply by leaving out of the brief the questions, and leaving in all the parts of the answers, material and immaterial. No effort whatever is made to brief the documentary evidence, but all the letters and telegrams are incorporated in what purports to be the brief in extenso. The only questions raised depend entirely upon a consideration of the evidence. Under the express requirements of Civil Code 1910, §§ 6140, 6141, and the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed. *Cunningham v. 1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 121*)—CONSTRUCTION—PARTIES.

Where two persons sign a note, apparently as joint principals, and there is nothing in the note to show that one is surety for the other, the presumption of law is that both are liable as joint principals. This is not, however, a conclusive presumption, and may be rebutted by parol evidence or by circumstances.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 495*)—PRINCIPAL OR SURETY—BURDEN OF PROOF—DISCHARGE.

Where one has signed a note, apparently as principal, but in reality as surety, the burden is on him to establish the fact of suretyship; and where he claims a discharge by some act increasing his risk, he must further show that the payee knew he was surety at the time of the act in question.

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 121*)—USURY (§ 127*)—SIGNATURE TO NOTE—EVIDENCE—DISCHARGE.

Whether one signs a note with another as joint principal maker, or as surety merely, is a question to be determined by the facts, and not by the opinion that either party to the contract may entertain. Under the uncontroverted facts in the present case, held, that the defendant was only a surety on the note, that usury was charged against the principal maker by the payee when the note was originally given, that the waiver of homestead contained in the note was rendered void by the usury, and, this secret taint of usury increasing the risk of the defendant as surety, the law released him from all liability thereon.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Action by the People's Bank of Summit against R. A. Williams, Jr., and John R. Sharpe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Sharpe brings error. Reversed.

Hawes & Pottle, for plaintiff in error.
Donalson & Donalson, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The People's Bank of Summit brought suit on a promissory note against R. A. Williams, Jr., and John R. Sharpe as joint principal makers. Williams admitted the execution of the note and liability thereon as principal maker. He alleged, further, in his plea, that John R. Sharpe signed the note only as surety. Sharpe filed a defense, and set up that he signed the note simply as a surety, that 10 per cent. usury had been charged on the note by the bank without his knowledge, that the note contained a waiver of homestead, and that as surety he was discharged on account of the usurious interest so charged; his risk as surety being increased. The jury rendered a verdict against both defendants as joint principal makers, and Sharpe brings error. His motion for a new trial contains numerous assignments of error, but the view that we entertain on the merits of the controversy makes a decision on these special assignments of error unnecessary.

[1] The contentions of the defendant Sharpe in the court below were, that he was a surety, that usury had been charged by the bank without his knowledge, and that as a legal result, in connection with the waiver of homestead by the maker of the note, Williams, his risk had been increased, and he was legally discharged thereon as surety. Two facts are not controverted: (1) That the note contained a waiver of the homestead exemption; and (2) that 10 per cent. usury was charged by the bank when the note was originally made and the money advanced by the bank to Williams. There was no evidence that Sharpe knew that the usury had been charged by the bank, there being nothing on the face of the note to disclose the fact, and Sharpe positively testified that he had no knowledge that usury had been charged by the bank. The only real contention in the case was as to the relation in which Sharpe stood to the note. It was contended by the bank that he was a joint maker. It was insisted by him that he was a surety only. In support of its contention the bank insisted that on the face of the note both Williams and Sharpe had signed as joint makers, that there was nothing in the contract itself that indicated that Sharpe was only a surety for Williams, and therefore the presumption of law was that Sharpe was liable as a joint principal with Williams. This is unquestionably the law. Trammell v. Swift Fertilizer Works, 121 Ga. 780, 49 S. E. 739. But it is equally well settled that this presumption is rebuttable, and can be disputed by parol evidence, or by circumstances, and the actual relationship of each one who signs his name to the note can be shown.

[2] Where one party to the note signs apparently as a principal, and he relies upon the defense of suretyship, the burden, of course, is upon him to show the fact of suretyship. And the burden is also upon him to show the further fact that the payee of the note, the one who advanced money thereon, knew of his relation as surety, or had reasons to know that he was such surety, when the alleged act increasing the risk was done. 1 Brandt on Suretyship, § 42; Goodman v. Litaker, 84 N. C. 8, 37 Am. Rep. 602; Hall v. Capital Bank of Macon, 71 Ga. 715. After all, the legal relationship of each party to the note or contract must be determined by the facts. This relation is not determined accurately or conclusively by the mere opinion of the parties to the contract. The fact that the bank thought and had reason to think that Sharpe signed as principal maker of the note did not make him such principal. Although Sharpe himself may have thought that he signed the note as a principal, this did not in law determine his true relationship to the contract. It may be stated that Sharpe testified positively that he signed the note as surety, and Williams, who admitted that he was the principal maker, testified that Sharpe signed as surety and not as joint maker with him. The cashier of the bank, per contra, testified that when the note was signed by Sharpe he did not know and had no reason to believe that the plaintiff signed other than as principal maker with Williams, and, moreover, that Williams had told him that Sharpe had an interest in his business and in the consideration for which the note was given.

However, there are admitted facts which in our opinion not only show that Sharpe was surety only, but which brought home to the bank knowledge that Sharpe was a surety—irrespective of how he signed. First. The note sued upon was not an original note. It was a renewal note. The original note was given to the bank by Williams with two other parties as sureties. Sharpe did not sign the original note. He did not know anything about the original transaction of Williams with the bank. He did not receive one cent of the money which Williams borrowed from the bank. He had no interest in the consideration of the note, or in any business of Williams in which the money borrowed by Williams from the bank had been used. When he signed the renewal note he had no interest in the consideration of the original note. Williams got no money from the bank on the renewal note. He simply got an extension of time of payment. Sharpe had no interest in the consideration of this note at any time, either when the original note was made or when it was renewed. At the request of Williams Sharpe signed the renewal note, in order that Williams might obtain from the bank an extension of payment of the note originally made by Williams and the other sureties. Under these admitted facts told the mere statement of the cashier that Williams told him that Sharpe was interested in his business have sufficient probative value to overcome these positive, uncontroverted facts clearly indicating that Sharpe was surety only? Even if Sharpe did have an interest in Williams' business at the time he signed this note, that of itself would not make him a principal maker; nor would it show, or tend to show, that he had any interest in the consideration of the original note. It may be stated, in passing, that Williams denied that he told the cashier that Sharpe had any interest in the note, or in the business for which the note was given. Be this as it may, the cashier unequivocally testified as to the original note, for which the present was a renewal: "When I loaned this money I did not know or recognize in this transaction any man on God's green earth except Williams."

[3] We do not think, therefore, that under these facts the question as to Sharpe's relationship to this note was an issuable fact. The question of his relationship to the contract must be determined by the facts, as we before stated, and these facts, in our opinion, amount to a legal demonstration that the relation which Sharpe held to this note was simply that of suretyship. These facts bring Sharpe squarely within the definition of a surety. Civil Code 1910, §§ 3538, 3541. He signed the note purely for the accommodation of Williams, to enable the latter to renew his note to the bank, having no interest in the loan and receiving none of the money. Buck v. Bank of the State of Georgia, 104 Ga. 660, 30 S. E. 872. This being true, and it being admitted that usury was charged by the bank when the loan was made to Williams, and there being no evidence that Sharpe had any knowledge tending to show that usury was charged in the note, and as the note contained a waiver of homestead, Sharpe's risk being thereby increased, the note was rendered void, and Sharpe was discharged from liability thereon. We think, under these facts, a verdict should have been directed in favor of Sharpe, and the judgment refusing a new trial is therefore reversed. Lewis, Leonard & Co. v. Brown, 89 Ga. 115, 14 S. E. 881.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. M. Hammond, Judge.

Action by C. W. Hudson against J. L. Phillips & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Theodore Titus, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Hudson was employed for the year 1906 by Phillips & Co., a corporation, at a stated salary. At the end of the year 1906 the president of the company informed him that the year had been prosperous, and that the company had decided to give him, in addition to his earned salary, a bonus of $1,000, which was paid him in cash. (This, however, is not involved in the direct question now before us.) The president of the company then told Hudson that as to the year about to begin (1907) the company would give him, in addition to the stated salary he had formerly received, a bonus or "gift" of an amount equal to what would be the earnings of $5,000 worth of the capital stock of the company, and during the year 1907 this amounted to $1,976, which was entered to Hudson's credit on the books of the company. The understanding was that Hudson would not demand the cash for this amount, as the company was needing its money for other purposes. However, he was allowed to draw a portion of it in cash. It was then agreed that the company would issue to Hudson $5,900 worth of its capital stock, taking in payment therefor the sum to his credit on the books of the company and Hudson's note for the difference; it being understood, however, that the stock was to be paid for out of the earnings. Later on the company fell into financial difficulties and a receiver was appointed. The receivership was a little later dissolved, and the company then took back from Hudson the stock, surrendered to him his note, and gave to him the note sued on, which represented the amount which had been credited in the original purchase price of the stock because of the amount standing to Hudson's credit on the company's books. Hudson sued on this note and the company defended on two grounds: (1) That the note was not the act of the corporation (an attempt at a plea of non est factum), because its treasurer, who signed it in the company's name, acted beyond his power in so doing; (2) that the note was nudum pactum. The plea set up all the facts stated above. The court struck it on general demurrer.

[1] 1. The so-called plea of non est factum was not sufficient. While it is alleged in general terms that the treasurer of the corporation had no authority to execute it on behalf of the corporation, the specific facts recited show that it was in fact a corporate act and deed. Prima facie, the treasurer was a proper officer to sign for the corporation. The plea also avers that the note was given under the direction of the president of the corporation and in pursuance of the arrangement, made by the corporation itself, under which Hudson was to surrender his stock.

[2] 2. That the note was not without consideration seems to be manifest. Even if the surrender of the stock cannot be treated as the true consideration, and if we look upon the note as representing the sum which was placed to the credit of the plaintiff on the defendant's books as a bonus in addition to his regular salary for the year 1907, still it is not nudum pactum. The promise to pay the definite bonus (i. e., a percentage of the company's earnings) in addition to the stated salary, being made concurrently with the contract for the plaintiff's services for that year, was not a mere voluntary promise. The so-called bonus was not, in legal essence, a gift at all, but was merely extra compensation, to be determined by something to be ascertained in the future. Such a promise, made at the beginning of the employment, is enforceable, though it would not be if made pending the term or after performance was complete. See Haag v. Rogers, 9 Ga. App. —, 72 S. E. 46, distinguishing Davis v. Morgan, 117 Ga. 504, 43 S. E. 782, 61 L. R. A. 148, 97 Am. St. Rep. 171.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Sparks Milling Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Sparks Milling Company brought suit against the Western Union Telegraph Company for damages growing out of the alleged negligent conduct of the defendant in the transmission and delivery of certain cablegrams. A general demurrer to the petition was sustained, and this judgment is here for review. The allegations of the petition are substantially as follows:

The Sparks Milling Company is a corporation manufacturing and selling flour. Ross T. Smyth & Co. represented it in Liverpool. On August 16, 1907, it had two separate negotiations with Smyth & Co. by cipher cablegrams over the lines of the defendant. The first cablegram related to what was known as "Armada" flour, and was sent by the milling company to Smyth & Co. It was as follows: "Best offer we can make is: We offer to sell you one thousand 140 lb. sacks Armada at 22 shillings." On the same day a reply was received, as follows: "We accept your offer of one thousand 140 lb. sacks Armada at 22 shillings." On receiving this acceptance the milling company cabled to Smyth & Co. the following: "We confirm sale [referring to the sale already completed of one thousand 140 lb. sacks Armada at 22 shillings], and offer you 1,000 more at a third advance." The last cablegram was not delivered to Smyth & Co. until the following day, August 17th. Between the sending of this last cablegram and its receipt, Smyth & Co. opened negotiations as to the second transaction by sending to the milling company the following cablegram: "We offer to buy of you 3,000 sacks weighing 140 lbs. Sparks' Best, at 23-6 shillings per sack, September and October shipment." This offer was not accepted, but a counterproposition was cabled to Smyth & Co. as follows: "We offer to sell you 3,000 sacks weighing 140 lbs. each of Sparks' Best at 24 shillings per sack. We offer to sell you 3,000 sacks, 140 lbs. each, of Yarrow flour at 23-6 shillings per sack, all September shipment." This cablegram containing the counterproposition was never delivered.

It is alleged that Smyth & Co., receiving no response to their "Sparks' Best" cablegram, necessarily construed the third cablegram relating to the "Armada" transaction as referring to their offer by cablegram to purchase 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best," and as an acceptance of that offer; that if they had received the third cablegram relating to the "Armada" transaction within a reasonable time, to wit, on the day on which it was sent, they would necessarily have interpreted it as meaning that the milling company was offering an additional 1,000 sacks of "Armada," weighing 140 pounds each at 22½ shillings; that, not receiving this cablegram within a reasonable time, and receiving no response to their offer to purchase 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best," and construing the third cablegram relating to the "Armada" transaction as referring to their cablegram with reference to "Sparks' Best," they resold the 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best," and insisted that the milling company was bound to deliver the 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best" at 23-6 shillings; and the milling company considering itself bound to deliver this flour in accordance with an apparently closed transaction as hereinbefore stated, and in the exercise of good faith, and with a view to preserving its credit and protecting its good name in the business world, carried out the trade and delivered the 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best" on the terms contained in the offer made by Smyth & Co., and to do so it was compelled to purchase in the open market 3,000 sacks, weighing 140 pounds each, of "Sparks' Best," at an advance of 3 shillings per sack, resulting in a loss of $1,080, for which sum the suit is brought.

Payne, Little & Jones, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The judgment dismissing the petition on general demurrer must be affirmed. Conceding the negligence of the defendant company as alleged, the damage to the plaintiff, nevertheless, did not result from this negligence, but was due to the voluntary act of the plaintiff in complying with the unauthorized demand of Smyth & Co., resulting from an inexcusable error of the latter in interpreting the third cablegram which by its express terms applied only to the "Armada" transaction, which transaction had been entirely closed by the two previous cablegrams, the offer made by the milling company and its acceptance by Smyth & Co., as referring to the cablegram offering to purchase 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best" at 23-6 shillings per sack, and as being an acceptance of the offer. The alleged delay in delivering the confirmatory cablegram referring to the "Armada" flour transaction cannot reasonably be considered as forming the basis of any claim for damages in connection with the "Sparks' Best" flour transaction. This cablegram could not have been reasonably construed as referring to the "Sparks' Best" flour transaction, or as a reply to the proposition to buy "Sparks' Best" flour, contained in the cablegram of Smyth & Co., for the very simple reason that the confirmatory cablegram by its terms referred to the "Armada" transaction, confirming the sale theretofore made of the 1,000 sacks of "Armada" flour and offering to sell 1,000 more sacks at a third advance. When Smyth & Co. construed this confirmatory cablegram as relating to 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best" flour, they made an unreasonable and inexcusable error, and this erroneous interpretation was in no sense binding upon the milling company; and if the milling company, for the purpose of protecting its credit, accepted this erroneous construction, it was its voluntary act, for it was not legally bound to sell the 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best" flour to Smyth & Co. at the price offered by them. It had expressly declined this offer, and had made a counterproposition; and, while the cablegram containing this counterproposition may not have been delivered, it is indisputably shown that there was not, in law a contract between the milling company and Smyth & Co. in reference to the "Sparks' Best" flour.

Now, unless the milling company was bound by a valid contract to sell to Smyth & Co. "Sparks' Best" flour, on the terms proposed in the cablegram, there could not be any recovery by it from the telegraph company. The essential condition precedent to the right of such recovery would be a valid contract with reference to "Sparks' Best" flour between the milling company and Smyth & Co. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Bailey, 115 Ga. 725, 42 S. E. 89, 61 L. R. A. 933; Beck & Gregg Hardware Co. v. Knight, 121 Ga. 292, 48 S. E. 930, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 420; Haber, Blum, Bloch Hat Co. v. Southern Bell Tel. Co., 118 Ga. 874, 45 S. E. 696; Richmond Hosiery Mills v. Telegraph Co., 123 Ga. 216, 51 S. E. 290; Bass v. Postal Tel. Co., 127 Ga. 426, 56 S. E. 465, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 489. Certainly it cannot be reasonably contended that the milling company was legally bound to Smyth & Co. to sell them the 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best" flour at 23-6 shillings per sack, when Smyth & Co. had not accepted the milling company's offer and had made it a counterproposition, which had never been received. This liability could only be claimed upon the assumption that the interpretation which Smyth & Co. placed upon the confirmatory cablegram relating to the "Armada" transaction was a reasonable and necessary construction, and was caused by the negligent conduct of the defendant company, as alleged. While the allegation is that, if this confirmatory cablegram referring to the "Armada" transaction had been delivered within a reasonable time to Smyth & Co., they would have discovered from it that it referred to the "Armada" transaction, and not to the "Sparks' Best" transaction, yet it is seen that when the cablegram was actually delivered, notwithstanding its express terms, they construed it as referring to the "Sparks' Best" transaction, and as an acceptance of their offer to purchase 3,000 sacks of the latter brand of flour.

[1] This whole case, it seems to us, lies in a very narrow compass, and may be comprehensively stated as follows: There were two transactions between the milling company and their correspondents, Smyth & Co. The first transaction related to the sale of 1,000 sacks of "Armada" flour at 22 shillings per sack. This contract was completed by the offer contained in the cablegram sent by the milling company to Smyth & Co., and accepted by Smyth & Co. in their reply cablegram. The third or confirmatory cablegram, which was sent by the milling company to Smyth & Co., was wholly unnecessary; for, the contract having been completed by the offer and acceptance above stated, no confirmation was necessary. Even, therefore, if the terms of the confirmatory cablegram bore out the contention that Smyth & Co. necessarily construed it, in the absence of any reply to their offer to purchase 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best" flour, as a reply to their cablegram and as an acceptance thereof, this erroneous interpretation was caused, not by any negligence of the telegraph company, but by the unnecessary act of the milling company in sending the confirmatory cablegram and in making it possible for the erroneous interpretation to be placed upon it. The offer to purchase 3,000 sacks of "Sparks' Best" flour was not accepted by the milling company and consequently there existed no contract binding upon it to sell this flour on the terms proposed by Smyth & Co. If the milling company, notwithstanding that it was not legally bound to sell this flour on the terms proposed, did so, not because of any legal liability, but for the purpose of protecting its credit and standing commercially, this was a mere voluntary act, and could not be the basis of a claim for damages against the telegraph company.

[2] 2. It is insisted by counsel for the plaintiff that in any event the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the petition, because the plaintiff at least was entitled to have the question of nominal damages passed upon by the jury. We think this contention is unsound for two reasons: In the first place, as we have endeavored to show, we do not think that the plaintiff has the right to recover any sort of damages from the telegraph company; and, in the next place, the suit is limited to a claim for special damages, arising under the circumstances set out in the petition. There is no suit for general damages or nominal damages; and, under such allegations, only the character of damages sued for could be recovered. In other words, there can be no recovery for either nominal or general damages, where the suit is exclusively one to recover special damages. Christophulos Café Co. v. Phillips, 4 Ga. App. 819 (2), 62 S. E. 562; Wright v. Smith, 128 Ga. 432, 57 S. E. 684.

DARBY v. STATE (No. 2,849.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 23, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 804*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ACCIDENTAL HOMICIDE.

Where it appears that the defendant shot the deceased with a pistol from his coat pocket, and the contention of the state was that the killing was deliberate and intentional, and the contention of the defendant was that the discharge of the pistol was accidental, and caused by the fact that his hand was maimed, so that, when he went to withdraw the pistol from his pocket, his finger caught over the trigger, and he pulled on it, thinking that it was the trigger guard, it was error for the court, in charging the jury, to neglect entirely to instruct them as to the defense of accidental homicide, especially in view of the fact that the judge gave a number of instructions to the jury as to what would be the legal effect if, though the discharge of the pistol was somewhat accidental the defendant was not entirely free from culpability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 364*)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

Where it appears that immediately after the shooting a witness went up to the defendant, who was still standing at the scene of the shooting, and walked a few steps away with him, and asked him why he shot, and he said then and there that he shot unintentionally, this statement being made in less than two minutes from the time of the shooting and under circumstances tending to negative premeditation, it should have been admitted in evidence as a part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 805, 808-810, 813, 816-818; Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 202*)—DYING DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

An alleged dying declaration is not admissible in evidence, unless it was made at a time when the declarant was in the article of death, notwithstanding that at the time it was made the declarant may have believed that he was going to die, and notwithstanding that he died immediately following an operation which took place a few hours later; and it was error for the court to instruct the jury that they should consider the declaration as a dying declaration in the event it was made between the time of the declarant's receiving the wound and the time of his death, and at a time "when he was conscious that he would die, and he was aware of his approaching death," without instructing them that the declaration should not be received unless he was actually in the article of death at the time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 202.*]

4. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Except as indicated in the foregoing head notes, there was no error.

Hill, C. J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Toombs County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

W. L. Darby was convicted of homicide, and brings error. Reversed.

H. D. D. Twiggs, Williams & Giles, Jones & Sparks, G. W. Lankford, Hines & Jordan, and S. N. Gazan, for plaintiff in error. Alfred Herrington, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. This court, after carefully considering the many assignments of error contained in the somewhat voluminous record, has finally been able to agree that the trial was free from error except as to the points set out in the first three headnotes preceding this opinion, and even as to them the Chief Judge is not convinced that what seems to the majority of the court to be error was such error as to justify a new trial.

[1] The homicide occurred while the defendant and the deceased were having an altercation in a public street. The defendant, it seems, used opprobrious language to the deceased (though there was some denial of this). The deceased struck the defendant a blow in the face with his hand, and according to the defendant's statement, and according to the testimony of the defendant's witnesses, threw his hand towards his pocket as if to draw a weapon. At this moment the pistol of the defendant, which was in his side coat pocket, was fired, and the mortal wound was inflicted. The defendant stated to the jury, and contended, that this firing of the pistol was accidental. It appears that the defendant was a small man, inflicted with a rheumatic infirmity in his lower limbs, and in addition to this he had been maimed by having the thumb and one finger cut from his right hand. The deceased was a large, strong man. The defendant stated to the jury, and contended, that when he was struck by the deceased, and saw him make the movement as if to continue the assault, he reached in his pocket with his maimed hand in order to get his pistol, so as to defend himself if the deceased in fact pursued the attack, and that in attempting to withdraw the pistol, which was an automatic revolver, his finger caught over the trigger, which he mistook for the guard, and the pulling upon the trigger caused the pistol to fire.

The judge in his charge nowhere instructed the jury upon the theory of an accidental shooting, except in the following language: "I charge you further, gentlemen, if you find from all the facts and circumstances of the case that the defendant was making an attack upon the deceased with an unlawful intention to kill, unjustifiably, and the defendant's pistol was discharged accidentally, and the deceased was killed, I charge you that such killing would constitute the crime of murder." It may be further noted that he also instructed the jury upon the subject of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act, as well as in the commission of a lawful act without due circumspection. We deem the omission of the court to instruct the jury as to the defense of accidental homicide a material error. If the defendant's statement as to the manner in which the pistol was fired be true, he was guilty of no offense, and the court should so have informed the jury.

[2] 2. The other members of the court somewhat share the doubt of the Chief Judge as to the point we are about now to discuss, but after careful consideration we have decided that the court erred in his ruling upon it. As soon as the shot was fired, friends of each party ran up. One of them took the deceased to a buggy, and the statement which the deceased there made as to how the homicide occurred was admitted by the judge as a part of the res gestæ. The court, however, rejected the testimony of another person to the effect that he immediately approached the defendant, and withdrew with him a few steps from the place where he was standing when he did the shooting, and asked him why he shot, to which the defendant replied, "I did not intend to shoot." This all occurred within less than two minutes from the time of the shooting, and the surrounding circumstances concerning the making of the statement are detailed by the witnesses. In the judgment of the majority of the court, the statement was sufficiently close to the act, and was apparently sufficiently free from afterthought (or rather forethought and deliberation), to require its admission as a part of the res gestæ.

[3] 3. An alleged dying declaration of the deceased was allowed in evidence. The testimony as to whether the deceased was in fact in the article of death at the time he made the statement is somewhat equivocal, though it was perhaps sufficient to justify the court in submitting the matter to the jury. But the court charged the jury as follows: "I charge you, if you find from all the facts and circumstances of this case that after the deceased was wounded, and between the time of receiving the wound and his death, he made certain statements as the cause of his death and who killed him, and if you find that these statements were made at a time when he was conscious that he would die, that he was aware of his approaching death, I charge you should consider that testimony along with the other testimony in the case in determining the main issue; that is, as to whether or not the defendant is guilty as charged beyond a reasonable doubt." It will be noticed that under the language of this charge the judge did not make the fact of the declarant's being in the article of death one of the prerequisites to his declaration being received as a dying declaration. A statement made "after the deceased was wounded, and between the time of receiving the wound and his death," was not necessarily a statement made while he was in the article of death. The law is plain that the declaration is not admissible unless the declarant was in the article of death at the time of making it. The man may be conscious that he is going to die, and may be aware of his approaching death, without being in a dying condition, or, as the law phrase is, in the article of death.

[4] 4. Except in the particulars which have already been discussed, we find no error; but we deem these sufficient to justify the grant of a new trial, as they seem to go to the very vitals of the case.

Judgment reversed.

HILL, C. J. (dissenting). I do not think the alleged errors on which the judgment of reversal is based, if errors at all, are of sufficient gravity to require another trial. Under the evidence a verdict for murder would have been amply supported, and a verdict for a lesser grade of homicide was manifestly a concession to sympathy, and not to doubt. Certainly, in my opinion, the verdict could not have been caused by any of the errors complained of, and for which a new trial is ordered.

1. The first assignment of error deemed material by the majority of the court is that the trial judge erred in neglecting entirely to instruct the jury as to the defense of accidental homicide. This theory is not raised by the evidence, but depends solely on the statement of the accused, and it has been repeatedly ruled by the Supreme Court and by this court that a theory of the defense which depends solely on the statement of the accused need not be charged, unless there is a written request, and in this case there was no written request to charge on this theory. While the evidence fully negated the theory of any accidental homicide, the statement of the accused does not present a case of killing resulting alone from an accident. The attempt to draw the deadly weapon from the pocket was admittedly intentional. But it is claimed by the accused that, although his effort to draw his weapon was intentional, he unintentionally pulled the trigger. He claimed that he endeavored to draw his pistol for the purpose of using it in self-defense. The trial court fully charged the law applicable to justifiable homicide in self-defense, and all the grades of homicide. Under the view which I take of the evidence, he also charged the law applicable to that character of accidental homicide logically deduced from the statement of the accused. The overwhelming weight of the evidence shows that the accused was the aggressor; that he made an attack upon the decedent with a deadly weapon for the sole purpose of resenting a blow with the open hand provoked by his opprobrious language, and the learned trial judge charged to the effect that if the accused made an attack upon the decedent with the unlawful intention to kill unjustifiably, and in this attack the pistol of the accused was discharged accidentally killing the decedent, the accidental discharge would be no justification. But if it be insisted that the actual discharge of the pistol was due entirely to an accident, and was not a part of an unlawful act, it seems to me that it was hardly necessary for the trial judge to tell the jury that an accidental killing of that character could not in any possible view constitute guilt of any kind. Courts of justice are not kindergartens, where the jurors are pupils and the judges are teachers of manifest truisms. Some intelligence should be accorded to jurors. The law says that they are "upright and intelligent"; and it does seem that the jurors might be presumed to know that a homicide, the result of an accident pure and simple, would not make the unfortunate actor guilty of any offense.

2. The second alleged error for which a new trial is granted, dubitante, is based upon the ruling of the court in excluding from evidence the following testimony: "We [meaning witness and defendant] went on down the street together. He had the pistol at that time in his hand, and he unbreached it and threw out the cartridges, and I says, 'How come you to shoot?' and he says, 'I didn't intend to shoot.'" The majority of the court thinks this declaration should have been admitted as a part of the res gestæ. I must confess that I do not know whether this declaration is a part of the res gestæ or not. What is or is not within the rule of res gestæ is one of those legal obstacles that cannot be surmounted by any inflexible criterion. The English doctrine that the declarations, to be admissible, must be contemporaneous with the main transaction, has been greatly enlarged by the American cases. Under these decisions the element of time is not always material. If the declarations are the spontaneous, impromptu outpourings of the mind, uttered either contemporaneously with or shortly after the main transaction, and are not merely descriptive or narrative of past events, they are admissible as res gestæ. In the present case this declaration was after the commission of the act, when the accused had left the place where the act was committed. It was not spontaneous or impromptu, but elicited by a question of a third person. If entitled to any weight at all, it was solely due to the credit to be attached to the speaker, and not to the nature of the declaration itself. I cannot think that the trial judge (who must necessarily be clothed with a very wide discretion) committed a serious error in excluding from the jury merely this declaration of the accused of his intention. The safest test of intention is the nature of the act and the circumstances under which it was committed, and not what the actor says about it after its commission. Besides, the accused got the full benefit of this defense when he stated to the jury that the shooting was accidental; and therefore, if the exclusion of this declaration as evidence was error, it was harmless error.

3. The third alleged error is that the trial judge failed to instruct the jury that they should not consider the alleged dying declaration, unless it was made at a time when the declarant was in the article of death. The statute requires, as a condition precedent to the consideration by the jury of a dying declaration as evidence, that it must be made when in the article of death and by a person conscious of his condition. Penal Code 1910, § 1026. If the judge omitted from his instructions the necessary element that the declarant must have been actually dying when the declaration was made to give the declaration probative value, and yet the evidence proved that the declarant was in fact dying when he made the declaration and he was conscious of his condition, would this failure amount to reversible error? Is it not the fact that gives probative value? And if this fact is shown, is not the requirement of the law fulfilled? In this case the attending physician testified that when the declaration was made the declarant was "in articulo mortis." He himself repeatedly declared that he was dying. From the time he was shot until his death he never uttered one word of hope, but every word unequivocally indicated consciousness of approaching death. The dying declaration, therefore, had every essential element necessary to make it evidence, and even if the judge neglected to include in the charge one of these elements, it nevertheless existed, and the jury had the right to consider it as evidence.

But I think the judge did in substantial effect instruct the jury that the evidence must show that the declarant was in the article of death when he made the declaration, before they could give it evidentiary value. His charge was as follows: "I charge you, if you find from all the facts and circumstances of this case that after the deceased was wounded, and between the time of receiving the wound and his death, he made certain statements as to the cause of his death and who killed him, and if you find that these statements were made at a time when he was conscious that he would die, that he was aware of his approaching death, I charge you should consider that testimony," etc. Taking this charge all together, can it be reasonably doubted that the jury understood that the evidence must show that the declarant was in a dying condition and was conscious of that fact before they could consider the declaration? How could the declarant have been "aware of his approaching death," unless death was in fact approaching? Of course, all men are in a sense aware of approaching death. The event is certain as to fate, only uncertain as to time. But this is not what the judge meant. He was speaking of the condition "at the time when the declaration was made," and the jury doubtless so understood him. Besides, the dying declaration was admitted for the purpose only of showing "the cause of death and the person who killed him." These two facts were not contradicted. The accused admitted the killing. If it be said that the dying declaration further included the statement that the accused "cursed the declarant, and he slapped him with his hand, and he shot him," these facts are also abundantly proved by eyewitnesses of the tragedy. In other words, the dying declaration was only cumulative, and disclosed no fact that was not proved.

For the foregoing reasons, I regard all three of the alleged errors, if errors, on which the judgment of reversal is based as immaterial. The accused has had a fair trial. He has no just complaint against judge or jury. Every substantial legal right was given him, and the evidence would have supported a verdict for a more serious offense.

1. EXEMPTIONS (§ 48*)—CROPPERS—"WAGES."

Where the landlord furnishes to the cropper everything to make the crop, except labor, and that is furnished by the cropper and his family, the net amount due the cropper after full settlement with the landlord is in the nature of "wages" paid to day laborers, and is not subject to process of garnishment while in the hands of the landlord.

2. WORDS AND PHRASES—"LABORER."

The test for determining who is a "laborer" is whether the work of a particular person involves mental skill, business capacity, involving the exercise of the intellectual faculties, or whether the work depends on mere physical power and manual labor; in other words, whether mind or muscle preponderate in the performance of the work.

Error from City Court of Dawson; M. C. Edwards, Judge.

Action by A. P. Passmore against I. F. Thompson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. H. Gurr, for plaintiff in error. H. A. Wilkinson, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Thompson was a cropper for Hill during the year 1909. Under a verbal contract between the landlord and the cropper the former was to furnish the land, the stock, the supplies, and everything necessary to make the crop, except the labor. This was to be furnished by the cropper and the members of his family. In making the crop and in the performance of his labor the cropper was to work under the directions and control of the landlord. For his labor the cropper was to receive one-half of the net proceeds of the lint cotton raised on the farm, and one-half of all the net proceeds of the other farm products, such as cane, ground peas, potatoes, and hogs, except the corn and cotton seed, all of which was to be the landlord's. The landlord was to advance during the year, from time to time, supplies necessary for the support of the cropper and his family. At the end of the year a settlement was made between the landlord and the cropper, and there remained in the hands of the landlord the sum of $98.29, net, which belonged to the cropper under the contract. Before a settlement was made, however, a judgment creditor of the cropper, holding a judgment rendered in 1903 for $250, sued out summons of garnishment against the landlord, and the landlord, in his answer to the summons of garnishment, set out the above-stated indebtedness of $98.29 to the cropper, arising under the cropper's contract with him for the year 1909. The cropper claimed that this fund in the hands of his landlord was exempt from the process of garnishment. The trial judge held to the contrary, and this judgment constitutes the only error for the determination of this court.

[1] There was no controversy in the evidence. The contract between the landlord and the tenant, as above set out, was admitted, and the judgment of $250 was admitted. The cropper testified that his family consisted of his wife and five children; three of the children being minors, and two girls over the age of 21 years. The principal part of the work on the farm was done by the cropper and his oldest son, Ben; these two doing all the plowing and heavy work incident to a farm. His wife and his children assisted him in hoeing and gathering the crop. Besides, on several occasions during the year, he exchanged work with two other adult sons; these two sons helping him for several days, and he in return helping them for several days. He was also compelled to employ additional labor for a few days to assist in picking his cotton. He had no contract with his two adult daughters, but they lived with him and were supported by him.

We think, under the facts of this case and adjudications of the Supreme Court, and a proper construction of the statute law of this state exempting the wages of a laborer from garnishment, that the court erred in holding that the wages of the cropper were not exempt from the process of garnishment. It has been repeatedly held by our Supreme Court that the statute exempting from process of garnishment the daily, weekly, or monthly wages of journeyman mechanics and day laborers (Civil Code 1910, § 5298) should be given a liberal construction, to protect the rights of those for whom the statute was passed. Caraker v. Matthews, 25 Ga. 571; Butler, Carter & Co. v. Clark & Co., 46 Ga. 468. And in designating the laborers who were embraced within the terms of the act, the Supreme Court has not confined itself to the express letter of the act, but has in many cases made most liberal constructions in order to carry out its manifest purpose. The act exempting from process of garnishment the daily, weekly, or monthly wages of the persons characterized as journeyman mechanics and day laborers was enacted for the purpose of furnishing the means of support to the laborer and those who are dependent upon him. It was intended to apply to those whose sole income for support and maintenance of themselves and family is the proceeds of their manual labor. From time to time our Supreme Court has held that locomotive engineers, street railway conductors, motormen, clerks in retail stores, railroad clerks, bookkeepers, public school teachers, farm hands, painters, bartenders, and stenographers were laborers, and that their wages, whether paid by the day, week, or month, semiannually or annually, were exempt from the process of garnishment. Cohen v. Aldrich, 5 Ga. App. 256, 62 S. E. 1015.

[2] In the case of Oliver v. Macon Hardware Co., 98 Ga. 249, 25 S. E. 403, 58 Am. St. Rep. 300, the court declares that the test for determining who is a laborer in any particular case is whether the work of the particular person involved mental skill, business capacity, involving the exercise of the intellectual faculties, or whether the work depended upon mere physical power and manual labor; in other words, whether mind or muscle preponderated in the performance of the work. Of course, every man, however intellectual his pursuit, may be in one sense a laborer, and every man who works with his hands, in order to win, must mix with his work and muscle, to some extent, at least, his brain; and just in proportion as man mingles his thoughts with his labor does he excel, whatever may be his vocation. But it ought not to be difficult for a discriminating mind, under the test laid down by our Supreme Court, to determine in each particular case under which category the particular laborer falls. Does the sweat of the laborer's brow come from the work of his brain or the work of his hands. If the latter, he is a laborer, although he may be a skilled laborer.

The character of his work must determine the question. McPherson v. Stroup, 100 Ga. 228, 28 S. E. 157. Clearly the act was made to protect and to give bread to the intelligent laborer, as well as to the ignorant laborer. The most liberal case decided by our Supreme Court is that of Caraker v. Matthews, supra. In that case "Jordan [the laborer] was to be Caraker's overseer for a year, at the price of $250, 200 or 250 pounds of pork, and 30 bushels of corn, the money to be paid daily, or weekly, as might be needed for the support of Jordan's family," and the court held that Jordan was a day laborer in the language of the law, and as such entitled to have his daily, weekly, or monthly wages exempt from the process of garnishment. Where a person was employed to work on a farm for six months at a stipulated price, but by the terms of his contract he could call at any time during his service for such portion of his earnings as he might require to supply his necessities, his wages were not subject to garnishment. Prothro v. Grubbs, 71 Ga. 863. There is no rational distinction on this point between a cropper and one who makes a contract to labor on a farm for a year, with the right to have advances according to necessities.

To no character of laborers does the divine declaration, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," apply more peculiarly and strongly than to what is known as the cropper class. The laborer of this class owns no land, no personal property of any consequence, has limited personal credit, and has usually a large family to support. The passing seasons only change the character of his labor. Preparing the soil, planting the seed, harvesting the crop, it is labor, hard manual labor, spring, summer, and winter from sun up to sun down. He exercises no individual judgment, and takes no initiative, but is always under the control and direction of the landlord. The man and his family live as they labor, on advances, sometimes grudgingly furnished by the landlord. When the year of labor closes, and the day of settlement arrives, and the advances are charged up, rarely sufficient is left to the cropper to feed and clothe himself and family. In this case the year's result from the labor of the family of seven, left after settlement with the landlord, was the meager pittance of $98.29. If this little sum should not be sacred to the support of the cropper and his wife and children, and should not be exempt from the claim of any creditor of the cropper, however just the claim may be, we know of no product of human labor that should be. If the wages of the overseer, the conductor, the engineer, the clerk, and the stenographer are exempt, why should not the wages of the cropper be also exempt? Advances made during the year are equivalent to wages paid during the year, and the net balance left to the cropper at the end of the year after settlement with the landlord is in the nature of wages.

In McElmurray v. Turner, 86 Ga. 215, 12 S. E. 359, the Supreme Court held that the share of the crop after the landlord had been fully settled with was simply a mode of paying the cropper wages for the labor of herself and her children, that the part of the crop which she and her children had made was in the nature of wages, and that her special laborer's lien was not lost because her children aided her in making the crop, nor because she had also hired some outside assistance to help harvest the crop." The McElmurray Case is almost identical on the facts with the instant case, and in principle is controlling. In that case Chief Justice Lumpkin declares that "all who come within the spirit of the act (meaning the exemption from garnishment act) should be brought within its provisions. I know no reason why the employes of corporations, or even journeymen mechanics, should have privileges which are withheld from those who till the earth. The cravings of hunger can no more be appeased in the one case than in the other."

The decision in the McElmurray Case, supra, answers also the suggestion that as the cropper in the present case was assisted by two adult daughters, and occasionally exchanged work with two sons, and hired some little assistance, he was a contractor, and not a laborer. It would be absurd to hold that because of these facts the work of the cropper rose to the dignity of intellectual labor and his wages were not exempt. If the landlord can be successfully garnished at the close of the year, and the cropper's share of the crop subjected, the result might be disastrous. The landlord would be unwilling to make advances to support the cropper, if he was to incur the annoyance and risk of litigation with the cropper's creditors at the close of the year; and surely the cropper would have little encouragement to finish his contract, if he knew that he would lose the small results of his year's labors just when he needed it most. In that event the temptation would be strong to desert his landlord and his own crops, and hire himself and his family as day laborers paid in money by the day. By this method he would be free from the pestiferous process of garnishment and reap the reward of his labors. In so far as we can, we will spare him the temptation to break his contract with his landlord, by holding that his part of the crop in the hands of the landlord is not subject to the process of garnishment, but, being in the nature of wages due the laborer, is clearly within the spirit of the statutory exemption.

Judgment reversed.

POWELL, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur with my Associates. It is true that the part of the crop which comes to the cropper is in the nature of wages, still I think that the very nature of this contract puts him in that class of working people who are regarded by the law as contractors or quasi contractors, and excludes him from the class designated in the exemption laws as "journeymen mechanics and day laborers." This distinction here asserted does not depend upon whether the work is chiefly manual or is largely intellectual, nor upon whether it is performed in the sun or shade, but upon the nature of the business the workman is carrying on. The honest toll of the village blacksmith, for example, is proverbial in song and story, and still, when he runs his own shop, the debts due to him by his customers are not exempt from garnishment. Tatum v. Zachry, 86 Ga. 573, 12 S. E. 940. The fact that a laborer is paid by the piece or by the actual quantity of work turned out is not material to the question before us, for that fact does not make him a contractor; but it is material if he undertakes to do a definite job, such as building a house, or repairing a bridge, or cultivating a crop upon a definite contract as to what he is to receive, for then he is viewed as a contractor, and not as a laborer. Johnson v. Hicks, 120 Ga. 1002, 48 S. E. 383, distinguishing and reconciling Swift Mfg. Co. v. Henderson, 99 Ga. 186, 25 S. E. 27, and Moore v. Hendry, 111 Ga. 863, 36 S. E. 921.

The cropper is, generally speaking, a farm hand who declines to work for fixed wages and to work generally on his employer's farm, but who makes a special contract whereby he is to work a particular piece of ground and is to have in return therefor a certain percentage of the net profits. He and his family are supported during the year out of advances made by the landlord and taken out of his portion prior to the settlement. It seems to me that the net sum remaining in the hands of the landlord after final settlement is so essentially of the nature of profits on the cropper's contract as to prevent its being considered as ordinary wages. The exemption law primarily contemplates that laborers shall have at hand their wages as due them from day to day, from week to week, or from month to month, as a fund from which they may furnish support to themselves and families, and that they shall not be deprived of this means of support through its being tied up on other debts—debts which are not less honest, but, in legal contemplation, less urgent. The cropper, in every case where the question of exempting his part of the crop arises, has had this support furnished him by the landlord; for there is no fund in the hands of the landlord, which in any event can be reached by garnishment, until these living expenses have been deducted. The overplus, if any, belongs in common honesty to the creditor, and not to the cropper. Debt may seem to be a cruel master; but he who owes debts ought to pay them, even if to do so reduces the expenditures of him and the family back to the necessities of life; and the law ought to make him pay thus far at least.

The opinion of the court seems to me to create an unjust distinction between a cropper and a tenant. A tenant and a cropper, for instance, may work adjoining fields. Under the tenant's contract he may pay the landlord a percentage of the crop as rent and retain the remainder, after paying for the supplies, as his remuneration for his labor; and his net interest in the crop is unquestionably subject to execution and other legal process. The cropper contracts that the landlord shall have a percentage of the crops, and that after the supplies are paid for he shall have the remainder as his remuneration for his labor; and, under the decision about to be rendered, his net interest in the crop is exempt. To my mind it seems unfair to say that the summer rays which fall upon the head of the tenant as he toils is mere sunshine, and that the similar rays which fall upon the cropper are hot sun, or that the exudation which trickles down their cheeks alike is in the one case perspiration and in the other case common sweat. If it were my province to enter into the political economy of the question, I would say that it is bad policy to take away from the cropper even that small basis of credit which exists in his favor as to his expectancy in the crop. His status for purposes of credit is low enough as it is. The present case, it is true, involves an old debt; but a new debt would stand on the same basis—even a new debt for family or crop supplies furnished any one other than the landlord.

However, I do not put my dissent on political economy, but on the law.

RAILROADS (§§ 442, 443, 447*)—OPERATION—INJURIES ON TRACK—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTION.

The plaintiff was driving at night along a way (not a legally established highway, but a road commonly used by the public), close to the tracks of the railroad company and parallel with them, within the corporate limits of a town. At a point just above a cut, his horse, becoming frightened at the headlight of an approaching engine, jumped over the wall of the cut, carrying the plaintiff and the buggy along. The plaintiff rapidly unhitched the horse from the buggy; but, seeing that he would be unable to get it out of the cut before the train would reach him if it continued at its ordinary speed, he (while the train was about 250 yards away) began waving his handkerchief to attract the engineer's attention. The train, without slackening, struck the buttocks of the horse, which was between the track and the wall of the cut on one side of the engine, and also the buggy, which was between the track and the wall on the other side, injuring both. The injury occurred between two public crossings and within 400 yards of one of them. The speed of the train was variously estimated; some stating that it was going very slowly, others that it was running very fast. There was evidence that the usual signals for the station and the crossings were not given. As to many of the physical features the evidence was in conflict. Held: (1) The evidence supports the verdict in favor of the plaintiff. (2) The jury was authorized to find that the engineer should under all the surrounding conditions, and especially in view of the locality in which the injury occurred, have maintained a lookout, and that he neglected to do so, or that the engineer, being on the lookout and seeing the danger to the plaintiff's property, did not use ordinary care to avoid injuring it. (3) There was no error in allowing the plaintiff to prove the distance from the place of the injury to the public crossing. (4) The court did not err in instructing the jury as to the statutory duty imposed upon the engineer in approaching the crossing, and in charging them that, while liability could not be established because of any neglect in this respect, still it was a relevant circumstance to be considered in passing upon the other acts of negligence charged against the defendant.

The case is before us on a main bill of exceptions assigning error on the judgment of the lower court in overruling a demurrer to some of the pleas, and on cross-bill assigning error on the judgment sustaining the demurrer as to one of the pleas and striking it. There was no final judgment in the case, and the bills of exceptions embraced matters only of an interlocutory character, which are not the subject-matter of a final bill of exceptions. MONEY RECEIVED (§ 6*)—WHEN ACTION LIES.

A cashier of a bank, who also acted as bookkeeper, by a mistake in bookkeeping caused a customer of the bank to be credited with $200 to which he was not entitled. The mistake in entry also caused a shortage in cash to appear. The cashier, insisting that some mistake had been made, but being unable to explain the matter satisfactorily, paid the bank the $200, and the bank, on the faith of the false entry, delivered to the customer two shares of stock, of the value of $200, and the latter accepted them to his own use. Held that, in an action in the nature of an action for money had and received, the cashier may recover the $200 of the customer, who took the benefit of the cashier's payment of that sum to the bank.

There it was held that Rudisill had no right of action against the bank, and it was intimated that he might have one against Handley. The headnote shows that we now hold what we then intimated. Handley stands in a very different relation to the transaction from what the bank did. He ought not to keep the stock without paying for it, and Rudisill is the one he ought to pay.

In a suit to recover damages for an assault with intent to rape, brought by the injured female against the wrongdoer, where the evidence for the plaintiff proved the tort as complained of in the petition, and there was apparently no legal insufficiency in the evidence, when considered in connection with the allegations of the petition, it was error to award a nonsuit because no pecuniary loss was shown. It is well settled that a simple assault may give a right of action for damages against the assailant; and an assault to commit rape is an aggravated assault. And in such an action it is not necessary to allege and prove any pecuniary loss, or even actual physical injury, to warrant a recovery. In the present case, however, there was evidence of some actual physical injury.

If one party to a continuing contract, consisting of mutual obligations, renounces and repudiates it prior to the date fixed for performance, the other party is at liberty either to immediately treat such renunciation as a breach of the contract and sue for damages sustained therefrom, or to treat the contract as still binding and wait until the time arrives for its performance, in order to give the party who has repudiated the contract an opportunity to comply with its terms. If he adopts the latter course, and at the time fixed for performance demands compliance on the part of the other party, his right of action for a breach depends on whether or not such compliance is then made. Ford v. Lawson, 133 Ga. 237, 65 S. E. 444. However, if a contract of sale rests in parol only, the parties may orally make it a part of the agreement that the seller shall have the right to make what is in effect an anticipatory breach, and to require the buyer to protect himself, as of the date thereof, from losses by reason of a subsequent rise in the market.

RUSSELL, J. The syllabus and the cases therein cited state and settle the points involved in both the cases here before us.

In the Hines case the propositions stated in the first two paragraphs of the syllabus are controlling, and show that the court erred in striking the pleas which set up the defenses indicated in these propositions. The proposition stated in the third paragraph of the syllabus controls also another defense presented in the Hines case. The court correctly struck the defense of anticipatory breach without damage, so far as relates to the written contract sued on, and erred in striking it so far as it relates to the other (the oral) contract.

In the Young case the facts pleaded are not sufficient to make the defenses outlined in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the syllabus available; and it follows, from the first proposition stated in the third paragraph of the syllabus, that the defense offered as to the anticipatory breach was not valid.

2. DAMAGES (§ 184*)—REDUCTION OF DAMAGES.

The rule which generally requires a party suffering damage from the neglect of another to diminish the damage does not require him to adopt a course which a reasonably prudent man would not have taken under all the circumstances.

Error from City Court of Griffin; W. M. Clark, Judge.

Action by P. S. Parmalee against the National Refrigerator & Butchers' Supply Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Robt. T. Daniel and Wm. H. Beck, for plaintiff in error. W. E. H. Searcy, Jr., for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The controversy was over an alleged breach of warranty in the sale of a refrigerator. The plaintiff claimed that it was warranted to produce such a degree of cold as to preserve his meats, and that it would not do so, and that he lost considerable meat through spoilage on that account. The plaintiff did not keep any books or other memoranda as to the weights or values of the different pieces of meat that were spoiled from time to time. He did testify, however, to a general recollection on the subject. He testified that there was a period of 520 days, net, during which he was daily required to take out spoiled meat; the amount being greater on some days than on others. He said it would average 10 pounds per day. He gave the values of the various kinds of meats that were lost, and, after giving these detailed values, claimed an average value of 15 cents per pound. He also swore that his estimate was a low one. His assistant estimated that 3 or 4 pounds per day were lost on an average. He also detailed with more or less generality the sizes and kinds of meats that were lost. The jury allowed $250, which was approximately equivalent to an allowance for a loss of 12 cents per pound on the basis of 4 pounds per day, or for a loss of 15 cents per pound on the basis of 3 pounds per day. It was substantially a finding according to the minimum estimate which the witnesses gave from their recollection.

[1] Where a party sues for specific damages, he has the burden of showing the amount of the loss, and of showing it in such a way that the jury may calculate the amount from the figures furnished, and will not be placed in the position where their allowance of any sum would be mere guesswork. However, the party does not lose his right of action for the damage because he cannot furnish exact figures. It is often the case that witnesses are called on to testify to the weight of a thing, though they have never weighed it, or to testify to length of time, though they have kept no count of the days or hours, or to testify to value, which is usually a matter of opinion. In all these cases, in the absence of more accurate source of inquiry being available, the witness states his best judgment, and this is regarded as being of evidentiary value. The jurors are not bound to accept the estimate or best judgment of a witness; but they may do so. If the witness be one of the parties, and he gives his estimate in the form of a maximum and a minimum (as where he says it was not less than so much and not more than so much), that estimate which is most unfavorable to the witness should be taken, in the absence of other testimony. In all cases the witnesses are subject to thorough cross-examination as to the basis on which they have formed judgment, and if the cross-examination discloses that what purports to be an estimate or statement of judgment based on observation is nothing more than a mere guess, the jury should disregard it entirely. The evidence of the witnesses in the present case (taking the witnesses as being credible) showed with reasonable clearness that the plaintiff's loss was not less than the amount allowed by the jury, and therefore the verdict cannot be said to be without evidence to support it.

[2] 2. Another point is that the plaintiff's recovery should not stand, because he failed in the duty of diminishing the damage; that he brought the loss on himself by continuing to use the refrigerator after knowledge that some of his meat would spoil if he used it. Under all the circumstances, we do not think that the verdict should fall on the theory here presented. The jury was correctly instructed as to the law governing this feature of the case. The plaintiff was running a business of considerable size. The refrigerator was not one of the small kinds found in our kitchen or pantries, but was large and expensive. He complained to the defendants, and they from time to time were attempting to remedy the situation and to make the refrigerator work satisfactorily. Now, the duty resting on the plaintiff was to use common prudence—to do what an ordinarily prudent man would have done under the circumstances—in order to make the damage as small as reasonably possible. Would an ordinarily prudent man have abandoned the use of the refrigerator, and have suffered perhaps a greater loss from the suspension of his business until he could get another? The percentage of the plaintiff's meat which was lost was relatively small. Ought he for such a small loss to have abandoned the refrigerator as a thing totally worthless, especially in view of the negotiations which were going on between him and the defendants as to the remedying of the defects? These were jury questions.

Judgment affirmed.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 483½*)—EXAMINATION OF EXPERTS—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION.

It is not necessary that a medical expert, who has himself made a post mortem examination of the deceased, and who is expressing an opinion as to the result of his own examination, and not one based on the evidence of other witnesses, be asked a hypothetical question.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1054*)—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTIONS—RULINGS AS TO COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Peebles, Judge.

Ed. Stewart was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. No error.

The defendant is charged in the indictment with the crime of murder, and was convicted of manslaughter.

Cleveland Bronson, a witness for the state, gave the following account of the killing, which was corroborated by several witnesses: "The prisoner was teaching school at the colored Herring schoolhouse, in Lisbon township. I was passing by there at the morning recess. It was raining when I got there. I was hunting and had my gun, and I set my gun down at the schoolhouse door; this was about the 26th of last January. The scholars were out of school at that time. I went in the schoolroom, and was talking with the defendant. He soon rang his bell for the scholars to come in again. After they had all come in and taken their places, he asked Bishop Wright, the deceased, why he did not march out right at recess. Bishop Wright said he thought he did march out like he had been marching out before. The teacher told him, 'No,' he did not; that he turned off at one side, when the rule was that he should march straight in front of the door far enough for all the other scholars to clear the steps. Then the prisoner asked deceased: 'Are you too grown up to obey orders?' Deceased said: 'No; I am not; I came here to obey orders.' The prisoner then said: 'Obey my orders, or I will beat you down to the floor.' The teacher then ordered Bishop to come out to him. The teacher then ran into Bishop and threw him on the floor; they tussled awhile, and the teacher reached and got a piece of lightwood, about the size of my arm, and about two feet long, and hit deceased with it two or three licks on the head, and got up off him. Bishop Wright went to pull up by side of house, and the teacher struck him again with the piece of lightwood on the side of the head. He stood a few minutes like he was stunned. He trembled just like when you hit a hog, and was bleeding at the nose. (Defendant objects. Objection overruled, and defendant excepted. First exception.) Bishop staggered around in schoolhouse like drunken person; he staggered up against stove and chairs in the room. (Defendant objects. Objection overruled. Defendant excepted. Second exception.) Bishop Wright went out the door, bleeding at the nose, and told the teacher that he did not think he had the right to beat him up that way. (Defendant objects. Objection overruled. Defendant excepted. Third exception.) Bishop Wright was about 16 or 17 years old; he did not hit or offer to hit the teacher during the fight."

Victoria Herring testified as follows: "I am sister-in-law to Bishop Wright. Bishop's mother was dead, and he lived with us since he was five years old. About 11 o'clock a. m., Bishop Wright came home, walking fast; head thrown back. He was crying, and his nose was bleeding, and he staggered about the room, and lay down on the bed; he was first up and then down. (Defendant objected. Overruled, and defendant excepted. Fifth exception.) He stayed about a half hour. He lived with my husband and myself. My husband soon came home, and nooked up a horse and buggy and took him off. The doctor lived about five miles. I saw him next at D. L. Herring's store, about two hours afterwards, about two miles from my house, lying down on the floor, kinder struggling. He was nearly dead. (Defendant objected. Overruled and excepted. Sixth exception.) Three or four o'clock he died."

Dr. Cooper, who was found by the court to be an expert, stated that he made the post mortem examination of the deceased, and that he died from cerebral hemorrhage—effusion of blood on the brain (the defendant excepted), caused presumably by a blow or fall. (The defendant excepted.)

The defendant testified in his own behalf, and his honor told the jury if they believed him to return a verdict of not guilty.

J. D. Kerr and Fowler & Crumpler, for appellant. Attorney General Bickett and Geo. L. Jones, for the State.

ALLEN, J. We have examined all of the exceptions appearing in the record, and find nothing of which the defendant can justly complain. It appears to us that he has been dealt with mercifully, as the evidence would have sustained a verdict of murder in the second degree, if not one in the first degree.

[1] Many of the exceptions were evidently taken as matter of precaution, during the progress of the trial, and not with the expectation that they could be successfully urged as ground for a new trial. The first three exceptions belong to this class, as the witness had to tell what took place at the time of the difficulty, if permitted to testify at all.

[2] The exception to the evidence of McKinley Herring is equally untenable. He was an eyewitness, and the objection is to the whole of his evidence. We do not think any part of his evidence incompetent; but if it were otherwise, and some of the evidence was competent and some not, a general objection to the whole evidence could not be sustained. State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 722, 45 S. E. 944.

[3] The exceptions to the evidence of Victoria Wright are without merit, and require no discussion.

[4] It was not necessary to propound a hypothetical question to Dr. Cooper, as he was expressing an opinion as the result of his own examination, and not one based on the evidence of other witnesses.

[5, 6] Dr. Sloan, an expert, was asked his opinion as to the cause of death, upon the assumption that the jury found certain facts in evidence to be true. The defendant objected because one fact, as to which there was evidence, was not incorporated in the question. We said at the last term, in State v. Holly, 155 N. C. 485, 71 S. E. 450: "It is not necessary in the statement of a hypothetical question that all the facts should be stated. Opinions may be asked for upon different combinations of facts, on the examination in chief, and on the cross-examination." If the defendant thought the fact, which was omitted, would have elicited a different opinion from the witness, it was his right and duty to incorporate it in a question on cross-examination.

[7] The defendant offered Mattie Andrews, a girl eight years old, as a witness. The court refused to permit her to testify, and makes the following statement as to the witness: "The exception in regard to Mattie Andrews was made the first time in the statement of appellant's case on appeal. The court asked Mattie Andrews who made her; she said she did not know. The court asked her if she knew anything about the obligation of an oath. She said, 'No.' The court then asked her what they would do to her if she told a lie on the witness stand. She said she did not know. The court found as a fact that she was not qualified as a witness, and stood her aside. No exception taken at the time, and no statement made to the court as to what they expected to prove by the witness." We cannot go outside the case on appeal; and, as no exception was taken, we cannot consider the objection. Besides, the evidence sustained the findings and ruling of the court. It was discretionary with the judge to allow or to refuse further examination of the witnesses.

The prayers for instruction were substantially given. We find no error.

No error.

ELLINGTON et al. v. DURFREY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 11, 1911.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 496*)—COMPENSATION.

One of the two executors appointed by a will, providing that they should receive as compensation the single sum of $2,000 each, and a commission of 5 per cent. on receipts of income, and 2 per cent. on disbursements thereof, having died pending the administration, he is not entitled to the $2,000, nor to a prorate share thereof, but his services should be measured by the rule of quantum meruit, to be gauged by the compensation allowed by law, had the will fixed no compensation, one-half of the commissions not exceeding 5 per cent. on the receipts of the estate, and not exceeding 5 per cent. on the disbursements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2107-2116; Dec. Dig. § 496.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Whedbee, Judge.

Controversy between F. K. Ellington and another, executors of Thomas B. Womack, deceased, as plaintiffs, and Cary K. Durfrey, surviving executor of Florence P. Tucker, deceased, as defendant. From a judgment for plaintiffs for less than claimed, they appeal. Reversed.

This is a controversy submitted without action to determine the amount due plaintiff's intestate as one of the executors of Florence P. Tucker, who died December 15, 1909, leaving a last will and testament appointing Thomas B. Womack and Cary K. Durfrey executors. This paragraph in the will is the only part of it pertinent to the controversy: "My said executors shall receive out of my estate, in full compensation for all services and responsibilities to be by them rendered and incurred, whether as executors or trustees, the single sum of two thousand dollars each, and in addition thereto, they shall be allowed a commission of five per cent. on the receipts of income, and two per cent. upon disbursements thereof, and may employ such reasonable clerical assistance as may be necessary. Owing to the trust and confidence I have in Cary K. Durfrey, it is my desire that my executors shall continue him in his present position with the same salary I shall be paying him at the time of my death." There was a judgment that plaintiffs' testator was entitled to $188.31, being one-half of the commissions on income fixed by the will, but no part of the $2,000.

Aycock & Winston, for appellants. Holding & Snow, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The facts set out in the case substantially show that Mrs. Tucker died December 15, 1909, leaving a will and appointing Thomas B. Womack, her legal adviser, and the defendant as executor. Judge Womack and his coexecutor transacted the business of the estate up to the death of the former, February 18, 1910.

The question presented is the just compensation due the estate of plaintiff's testator. It is stated in the record that during the time he acted as executor the receipts of the estate amounted to $46,920.22, not including sales of any real estate, and the disbursements $7,347.66. The question presented is one of first impression, and we are without precedent or authority to guide us. We agree with his honor below that the plaintiffs' intestate is not entitled to the $2,000, and, as the time when it was to be paid is not fixed by the will, it is impossible to prorate it. The plaintiffs' intestate was prevented by death from fully discharging the duties as executor for which the $2,000 was plainly intended as compensation for all services to be performed by the executor in addition to the commissions on income fixed by the will.

We think, however, that plaintiffs' intestate failed to perform all the services, not by his own fault, but because of his untimely death. Consequently we are of opinion that his services should be measured by the just and reasonable rule of quantum meruit, and that should be gauged by the compensation allowed by law, had the will fixed no compensation. We are of opinion that plaintiffs' intestate is entitled to one-half of the commissions, not exceeding 5 per cent., upon the sum of $46,920.22, the receipts of the estate, and not exceeding 5 per cent. upon the sum of $7,347.66 disbursements. This, of course, will not apply to the executor Durfrey, who is living and discharging the duties of sole executor. His compensation will be adjusted by the terms of the will.

The superior court will fix the percentage of commissions, and allow plaintiffs' intestate one-half of the whole.

Reversed.

PETTIT v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 4, 1911.)

1. INFANTS (§ 14*)—EMPLOYMENT—APPLICATION OF STATUTE.

Acts 1903, c. 473, now Revisal 1908, § 1981a, providing that no child under 12 years of age shall be employed in any manufacturing establishment or factory, only applies to employment in the places named, and not to the employment of an infant by a railroad company as a messenger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 91*)—NEGLIGENCE—INFANTS.

In the absence of statute, a recovery cannot be had for injuries to an infant employed under 12 years of age, merely because he was an infant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 276*)—INJURIES—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for the death of plaintiff's child claimed to have been employed by it as a messenger when injured, evidence held not to show that intestate was performing any duty for defendant when injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 276.*]

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by Sallie Pettit, administratrix, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action brought by the administratrix of Joe Pettit to recover damages.

The complaint alleges the death of the intestate, his employment by the defendant as a messenger boy, the nature of his duties, a description of the place where he had to work, and then alleges specifically the acts of negligence complained of as follows: "On the 28th day of April, 1907, the said infant was given a message by the defendant, and carelessly and negligently directed by the defendant to deliver the same to another one of its employes, and to do so required the infant to go somewhere on the yard to track No. 9 or 10. About this time an engine with a number of cars of defendant, going south, passed, when the said infant undertook to go upon said slowly moving train to the point where the message was to be delivered. He stood upon the iron steps of a flat car in the said train, and suddenly the said car upon which he was standing, failing to clear another car standing on a track of the defendant, said infant was knocked from his position by coming in contact with the said car on the adjoining track, he was thrown between the wheels of the moving train, and was so badly injured that he died the same afternoon."

The following evidence was introduced by the plaintiff:

Mrs. J. W. Splers, formerly Mrs. Sallie Pettit, testified as follows: "Q. Your name is Mrs. J. W. Splers? A. Yes. Q. You are the mother of the young man, Joe Pettit, that was killed at South Rocky Mount? A. Yes. Q. When were you married the last time? A. Last December, three years ago. Q. The date was recorded in your brother's Bible? A. Yes. Q. And these dates were recorded at the time of the birth of the children? A. Yes. Q. Do you know of your own knowledge how old he was? A. Yes, he was 11 years; would have been 12 in June, 1907. Q. Did you ever give your consent that this boy should go to that company to engage in this work? A. No. Q. How was the boy dressed, with reference to long or short pants? A. Short, knee pants. Q. What number of clothes did he wear, with reference to pants? A. No. 12; No. 11 all the time before. Q. dinner table. Q. How long after that before your child died? A. I think it was somewhere about 4 that same afternoon." Cross-examination: "Q. When was the first time, Mrs. Splers, that you heard that your boy was working for the railroad? A. When he got his job he told me. Q. How long before this accident did he tell you he had a job? A. He told me as soon as he got his job. Q. See if you can't remember how long before his accident? A. At the last time he had been at work for a week. Q. How long the first time? A. About two months. Q. It is alleged that he had been in the employment about four days? A. Well, somewhere about a week, the last time I think it was on a Tuesday he began, and was killed Sunday. Q. But before he had been working about two months? A. Somewhere about that time. Q. When he went there the second time, did you tell him not to take it? A. No, sir; I don't think I did, but he said, 'I am going back and take my same job and' — Q. Did you say not to do it? A. I don't remember what I said to him. Q. The first time, did you tell him not to take it? A. I don't know, sir." Redirect examination: "Q. Did you know just what duties he had? A. He told me he was a messenger boy; but I didn't know anything about it. Q. Did you know anything about the danger attached to the job? A. No, sir; I had never been on the yard, and I didn't know anything about it. Q. Did you know how many tracks or trains there were there? A. No. Q. Mrs. Pettit, how many other children have you? A. I have seven besides him." Recross examination: "Q. He told you he took messages from one office to the other? A. Yes. Q. Brought his money home? A. Yes, to me."

Mr. J. W. Splers testified as follows: "Q. Mr. Splers, you are the husband of the lady who left the stand? A. Yes, sir. Q. Mr. Splers, you have been in the employment, off and on, in the railroad at Rocky Mount? A. Yes. Q. You knew the condition of the yard at South Rocky Mount in April, 1907? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you happen to know what duties Joe Pettit was discharging at the time of his employment? A. Messenger boy. Q. In the office of Mr. E. S. Dodge? A. Yes, chief train dispatcher. Q. And where were most of the messages to be carried? A. To the yardmaster's office; his office was placed diagonally across from the dispatcher's at that time. Q. And over how many tracks did he have to go? A. At that time he had to cross somewhere between 8 or 10 tracks; I don't exactly know at that time. Q. The yard has been torn up and removed and these tracks have been torn up? A. Yes. Q. Over these 10 or 12 tracks between Dodge's office and the other office, how many trains moved, and how often? A. I can't tell; there was continuous shifting all the time. All the yard engines from the roundhouse had to be delivered there.

Q. When the trains come in, were not all trains handled over these tracks? A. Norfolk and Charleston passenger trains were. Q. What about the making up of these trains? A. Well, they were made up in the south yard and were left down in south yard; they had to go over these tracks; all trains leading north. Q. What became of the cars going north? A. They passed through the same tracks; they were made up in the northern end of the yard and passed over the main line track. Q. To what extent were these tracks being used? A. For classifying freight, loading and shipping freight, etc. Q. How often? A. Continuously. Q. What did you say Joe's duties were? A. Messenger boy. Q. Took messages from the dispatcher's office to the yardmaster? A. Yes."

Mr. J. R. Pettit testified as follows: "Q. Look at that; do you remember that? A. Yes. Q. Speaking with reference to that, that is what year? A. 1907. Q. A wire that your brother has been hurt? A. Yes. Q. You were living here at that time? A. No, sir; I was living at Rocky Mount; but I was over here that day. Q. Did you know what your brother's duties were? A. Messenger boy, to carry messages to any office he was sent. Q. Court: Were there any other duties? A. He was supposed to deliver messages to Mr. Robinson, Mr. Trueblood, and other offices on the yard. Q. Just locate where these offices were and how many trains and tracks there were? A. Mr. Gorham's office was in the end of the principal shed, and there were 12 tracks, I think, or more, there at that time, and he had to cross these tracks to his office. Mr. Trueblood's office was across these tracks over between Mr. Gorham's office and the shop. Q. What about the tracks there? A. He had to cross these same tracks. There was continued shifting and making up trains all the time during the day. Q. What about Mr. Robinson's office? A. Robinson's office was back of the shop. Q. How many tracks would he have to cross going to Robinson's office from the dispatcher's office? A. About 15 or 16; it was behind the shop. Q. Where was the office of the chief train dispatcher, Mr. Dodge, with reference to the main tracks of the A. C. L.? A. It was above the Coast Line restaurant. Q. How far away from the main line tracks? A. I don't really know exactly. Q. As far as what? A. It was the distance of this building or may have been more. Q. About 50 feet? A. I suppose it was 50 feet or more. Q. These tracks were in front of Dodge's office? A. Yes. Q. How many of these tracks were there? A. There were only two main line tracks and other tracks leading to them. Q. How many of these? A. A good many of them; I don't remember how many. Q. How many trains and shifting engines and engines and cars passed over these tracks? A. There was continuous shifting by trains for different points, Richmond, Florence, and Norfolk, over these tracks. Q. Mr. Pettit, do you happen to know what your brother was receiving? A. $12.50 per month." Cross-examination: "Q. Mr. Pettit, you have spoken of his duties and the messages to take to the offices; how would he proceed to carry it there? A. Well, I suppose he would walk. Q. Don't you know it was his business to walk from the point? A. Yes, I suppose that was the point of it. Q. That was his business? A. Yes, that was part of it. Q. Now, was there anything in his duty that required him to undertake to go upon a slowly moving train to the point where the message was to be delivered and ride upon iron steps of a freight car? A. I don't know. Q. So when he attempted to ride a slowly moving train he did that because he wanted to? A. He did as all the others did. Q. Didn't he do that because he wanted to? A. Yes, sir; and not only him but all the others that age. There were more than him." Redirect examination: "Q. There were other young children employed around the shop? A. Yes. Q. The dispatches this boy had to deliver were telegrams? A. Yes." Cross-examination: "Q. There were orders as well as telegrams? A. Any messages he might be given from the dispatcher's office. Q. He would take any message? A. Yes."

Mr. Batts testified as follows: "Q. What is your name? A. J. W. Batts. Q. Where do you reside? A. South Rocky Mount. Q. What is your employment? A. Train engineer. I was fireman at the time of this accident. Q. Fireman in April, 1907? A. Yes. Q. In whose service? A. Atlantic Coast Line. Q. Where were you on the day that Joe Pettit was killed? A. Q. You are in the employment of the Coast Line at that time? A. Yes. Q. Your duties called you upon the yard? A. Yes."

The plaintiff rested. The defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit. Motion allowed, and plaintiff excepted. The court signed the judgment of nonsuit as set out in the record, to which plaintiff excepted and in open court appealed to the Supreme Court.

The plaintiff contends that the employment of the intestate, a child between 11 and 12 years of age, was so dangerous that it alone was evidence of negligence, and that he was killed in the performance of his duty.

The defendant contends: (1) That there is no evidence of negligence. (2) That, if the employment of the intestate is evidence of negligence, there is no evidence that the intestate was on duty when killed, and therefore the negligence of the defendant was not the real cause of death.

H. A. Gilliam and Aycock & Winston, for appellant. F. S. Spruill, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The question presented by the record has, within a few years, been considered by this court in six cases. Ward v. O'Dell, 126 N. C. 948, 36 S. E. 194; Fitzgerald v. Furniture Co., 131 N. C. 645, 42 S. E. 946; Hendrix v. Cotton Mills, 138 N. C. 170, 50 S. E. 561; Rolin v. Tobacco Co., 141 N. C. 310, 53 S. E. 891, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 335; Leathers v. Tobacco Co., 144 N. C. 342, 57 S. E. 11, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 349; and Starnes v. Manf. Co., 147 N. C. 563, 61 S. E. 525, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 602. The last three were against manufacturing establishments, and were based on the statute (chapter 473, Acts 1903, now Rev. 1908, § 1981a), which provides: "That from and after January 1st, 1908, no child under twelve years of age shall be employed in any factory or manufacturing establishment in this state," and we deduce therefrom the following principles:

- (1) That the statute is constitutional.
- (2) That it applies to employment in factories and manufacturing establishments, and to no other.
- (3) That the employment of a child under 12 years of age in a factory or manufacturing establishment is negligence per se.
- (4) That such negligence is proximate, if the child is injured as the result of his employment.
- (5) That there is no assumption of risk by the child.
- (6) That the negligence of the parent, if any, in permitting the employment, cannot be imputed to the child.

(7) That, in addition to the usual presumption against contributory negligence, there is a presumption that the child has not the capacity to appreciate the dangers of his employment.

(8) That this presumption may be rebutted.

[1] These decisions are not however, authoritative in this case, because the employment of the intestate is not within the statute, and is not forbidden by it, and we are not at liberty to extend the statute to include employments not within its letter or spirit.

In the Hendrix Case, the boy was employed to work at the complicated machinery of a cotton mill; but, as he was 12 years of age, the case was decided on the principles of common law, and not on the statute, and it was held that there was a failure of proof as to negligence and proximate cause.

In the O'Dell and Fitzgerald Cases, there was evidence of the negligence of the employer outside of the dangerous character of the employment, in that in each there was evidence of a failure to instruct the child, and in both the question discussed was the correctness of instructions on contributory negligence. The opinion in the Fitzgerald Case was written by Chief Justice Clark. He quotes with approval the following language from Thompson on Negligence: "The law puts upon a master, when he takes an infant into his service, the duty of explaining to him fully the hazards and dangers connected with the business, and of instructing him how to avoid them. Nor is this all; the master will not have discharged his duty in this regard unless the instructions and precautions given are so graduated to the youth, ignorance, and inexperience of the servant as to make him fully aware of the danger to him, and to place him, with reference to it, in substantially the same state as if he were an adult." He also refers to the statutes from many of the states, and from Europe, giving the ages at which children may be worked in factories, and concludes: "With this consensus of opinion in nearly the entire civilized world, it might be that it would not have been error if the judge had held that it was negligence per se to put a child of the tender age of nine years to work on a dangerous machine which he had never seen before, without any instructions or warning, and to leave him there by himself without stopping the machine. But, however that may be, it certainly was not error to leave the question of negligence to the jury with the charge given in connection therewith, which was very favorable to the defendant."

[2] Accepting this as a correct statement of the law, we must abide by it, and cannot permit a recovery of damages for no reason except that a child has been injured. We may have pity and may be inclined to heed "the sob of the child in its helplessness";

but we must accept the law, as we understand it, as our guide in determining the rights of litigants, bearing in mind the admonition of Judge Daniel: "The courts should not be wiser than the law."

[3] The question is not presented in this record, and therefore it is not necessary to decide it; but we might go further than the Fitzgerald Case and hold that, when the employment is dangerous, it is not necessary to prove a failure upon the part of the employer to instruct, and still there would be no evidence of actionable negligence in this case, because there is nothing in the evidence to show that the intestate was on duty, or was performing a duty for the defendant. The evidence is vague and unsatisfactory. No witness swears on what day the intestate was killed; but we assume it was on a Sunday in April, 1907. No one swears he was killed by a train of the defendant; but we accept this as proven, although it would have been easy to show signs of blood on the rails or track, which was not done. The only statement as to how the intestate was injured is contained in the answer of the defendant, which was not in evidence: "That the said Joe Pettit, at the time he received the injuries alleged in the complaint, was rendering no service to the defendant, and was where he had no right to be. That said Pettit, of his own will and accord, and against the warning of his companions, attempted to get on a passing flat car, missed his catch, fell, and the wheel of the car passed over and mashed his feet, without any fault of the defendant."

No witness says that the intestate was on duty the day he was killed, or that he was performing a duty for the defendant at the time of his death.

These facts were not peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, as his mother and stepfather knew whether or no he was on duty that day. Both knew he was employed by the defendant, and the mother received his wages.

The evidence, accepting it as true, shows that he was a messenger boy to carry messages, and that he had to cross the tracks; but there is no suggestion that he had to ride passing freight trains to perform these duties.

We repeat here the evidence of the witness Batts, who is the only witness who testifies to any fact connected with the killing: "Q. What is your name? A. J. W. Batts. Q. Where do you reside? A. South Rocky Mount. Q. What is your employment? A. Train engineer. I was fireman at the time of this accident. Q. Fireman in April, 1907? A. Yes. Q. In whose service? A. Atlantic Coast Line. Q. Where were you on the day that Joe Pettit was killed? A. I was on the yard; had been out at work and just started home. Q. At what time? A. Between 11 and 12. Q. Did you see Joe Pettit that day? A. Once; I saw him on the corner of the car. Q. State what position he occupied on the car? A. He was standing on the steps and holding to the lower round. Q. What kind of a car? A. Box car. Q. In motion? A. Yes, moving. Q. Did you see Pettit again this day? A. Yes, after he was run over. Q. What attracted your attention? A. I heard some one scream out. Q. Where did you find Pettit? A. He was lying on the track. Q. What was his condition? A. One leg off. Q. Do you know to what extent the tracks are used for the making up of trains and the classification of cars of the Coast Line? A. Yes. Q. What was it; go ahead and state to the jury for what purpose they were used? A. They were put there for incoming trains and for making up trains going out. Q. How frequently are engines and trains passing back and forth through the yard? A. Most all the time."

The clear inference from this evidence is that the intestate, acting outside of the line of duty, jumped on a passing train, fell off, and was injured.

If we confined the plaintiff strictly to the allegations of the complaint, the case would be stronger against her, as no one could urge that there is any evidence that the intestate was knocked off the car by coming in contact with a car on another track.

The plaintiff was not inadvertent to the necessity of proving that the intestate was on duty, because he alleges that the intestate was in the discharge of his duty, and was engaged in delivering a telegram; but he offered no evidence to sustain these allegations.

After a careful consideration of the case, we conclude that his honor committed no error in ordering a nonsuit.

No error.

WALKER, J. (concurring). I concur fully in the opinion of the court, as delivered by Justice ALLEN, and it has had my unhesitating assent from the beginning. He has stated the facts of the case, as I understand them, with such literal excerpts from the testimony as were necessary to show the exact situation when the boy was injured. It may, under certain circumstances, be negligent to employ, in a dangerous occupation, a boy of tender years, and without sufficient experience and intelligence to understand and avoid the danger; but, however this may be, the question is not even remotely involved in this case, and the decision proceeds upon the facts of the case, as disclosed by the undisputed evidence, and not upon any hypothetical matter. The youth of the child and the danger must, in any possible view of the question of negligence, have been, not only the cause, but the proximate cause, of the injury, and there is nothing in this record that, in my judgment, tends to present any such case. The boy was riding on the stirrup of the moving car for his own amusement and diversion, and not in the discharge of any duty as messenger, or in the course of his employment as such. Not only this, but it appears that his companions and playmates, who were of his own age, warned him not to ride on the car, so that he was not too young to be unaware of the danger, even if he had been in the line of his employment, and, in the absence of a statute making it unlawful to employ a boy of his age in such business, it would have been a question for the jury to determine, upon the evidence, the degree of his intelligence and his capacity to know and understand the risk, even if the question of negligence had been in any way involved in the case. It is clear that the mere fact of his employment, coupled with his youth, does not show actionable negligence, even though the extreme view of the law be adopted, unless the injury can be referred to those facts as its proximate cause, and this, we see, cannot be done. He was not carrying a message, but playing, and the company is no more liable for his injury than if he had been hurt while engaged in any other sport or pastime. His being under age is therefore an irrelevant matter, as it did not cause the injury. This is a case where there has been a loss without an injury (damnum absque injuria). The railway company is no more liable to the plaintiff than if the boy had not been in its employ, but was injured while engaged in some sport or play, such as shinney or baseball. There is an entire lack of cause and effect. If a man or boy is hurt, he is not entitled to recover, even of a railway company, because he was employed by it, unless the injury was brought about by some neglect of duty to him on the part of the company. The latter must have owed him a duty and failed to perform it, thereby causing the injury. But there is no such case here, and none that bears any resemblance to it. The boy was hurt by accident resulting from his own daring, for which the railway company is in no way responsible. We sympathize with the plaintiff, but in deciding his case we must not be influenced by our feelings. It is not a matter of sentiment, but a question of law to be solved by the consideration alone of the cold and unyielding facts of the case. It is the safe and only rule, when making a decision, never to lose sight of the facts, but to keep them steadily and constantly before us, for whatever is outside of the facts is also outside of the law of the case, which consequently becomes a mere abstraction.

BROWN, J. I concur fully in the opinion of the court written by Mr. Justice ALLEN. As he has clearly demonstrated, I think the question as to whether the defendant company had the right to employ a boy of 11½ years of age as a messenger in its telegraph dispatcher's office at South Rocky Mount is not presented in this case. I do not think the court should pass on matters not necessary to a decision of a case. When courts go further than this their expression of views is regarded as not authoritative and mere obiter dicta.

The matter of the employment of child labor in certain vocations is very largely a matter for the wisdom of the General Assembly and not for the courts. I think we should be careful not to enter the domain of the law-making power.

The matter of child labor has been discussed at several sessions of the Legislature, and so far it has not interfered, except in the case of manufacturing establishments.

There is no legislative restriction upon the employment of boys even under 12 years as messengers in telegraph offices, whether such offices are operated by railways or other corporations. Such employment is very general.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The plaintiff was not accorded the privilege of a jury trial to determine the facts. Therefore the evidence must be taken in the most favorable aspect for him and in the light of the most favorable inferences which could have been drawn therefrom by the jury. His intestate was a child, small for his age which was under 12, and had not taken off knee pants. He was employed at South Rocky Mount to carry messages across a yard filled with 18 or 20 tracks, with engines and trains moving backwards and forwards every few minutes. Among these were through trains, and also the shifting engines, moving freight and passenger cars to make up trains. His duties required him to carry messages over and across this yard. A more deadly and perilous place could not be imagined. Such duty would have taxed the discretion and judgment of a much maturer person. The defendant did not attempt to show that they had given the child any caution or instruction whatever.

In Fitzgerald v. Furniture Co., 131 N. C. 640, 42 S. E. 947, this court cited with approval the following language from Thompson on Negligence: "The law puts upon a master, when he takes an infant into his service, the duty of explaining to him fully the hazards and dangers connected with the business and of instructing him how to avoid them. Nor is this all; the master will not have discharged his duty in this regard unless the instructions and precautions given are so graduated to the youth, ignorance, and inexperience of the servant as to make him fully aware of the danger to him and to place him, with reference to it, in substantially the same state as if he were an adult." This being a duty devolving upon the defendant, the burden was upon it to show that such caution was given and its nature. But nothing of the kind was even attempted to be shown. It follows that the presumption is not removed that such caution was not given.

In Ward v. O'Dell, 126 N. C. 948, 36 S. E. 195, a child 11 years old, employed in a factory, in passing from one part of the mill to another stopped for a moment at a bench where a wire was being cut, when a piece of wire flew off and put out his eye. It was held that the injury was conclusive that the work was dangerous, and that in such case "these little creatures exposed to such dangers against their will cannot be held guilty of contributory negligence." Nor was it a defense that the child was hired to the company by the father. "It was the child's eye which was put out, not the father's. The father could not sell his child nor give the company the right to expose him to danger. The superintendent put these children to work, knowing their immaturity of mind and body, and, when one of them thus put by him in places requiring constant watchfulness is injured, every sentiment of justice forbids that the corporation should rely on the plea of contributory negligence." If that is true as to cutting wires in a factory when the child was not on duty at the time, it is necessarily so as to the danger 10 times more deadly of crossing 18 to 20 tracks with engines and cars constantly moving backwards and forwards and when the child's duties required him to cross the tracks.

On this occasion there was no eyewitness how the child was killed, but he was found dead upon one of these tracks with his leg cut off. The inference is irresistible that he was killed by a passing train. Powell v. Railroad, 125 N. C. 370, 34 S. E. 530. If there could be any possible doubt about it, the evidence was certainly sufficient to be submitted to a jury to draw the inference. The little child being found dead with his leg cut off in such a network of tracks, among constantly shifting trains, creates as strong a presumption that his leg was cut off by one of these trains as, when a soldier is found dead on a battle field with a bullet through his head, that he was killed by the enemy.

It is urged that it is not shown that the little boy in his knickerbockers was on duty because there is evidence tending to show that he was killed on Sunday morning. The opinion of the court says: "No one testifies that the boy was killed on Sunday. We assume it." Yet nothing is better settled than that nothing can be assumed against plaintiff on a nonsuit. The evidence is that he was employed to carry dispatches across these tracks. The very nature of the work as a necessity in operating trains is conclusive that it was carried on every day. There is no evidence whatever that these messages were not required to be sent on Sunday as well as on other days. It is well known that these through trains, and that also the shifting of cars and engines on these tracks, are operated on Sunday, as well as on other days. His duty was such as could not cease on Sunday. Reference to the decisions of this court will show cases in which this defendant was sued for the penalty in sending out its freight trains from this very yard on Sunday, and the defense was upheld that it had a right to send out through freight trains. The statute also permits the dispatching of both local and through passenger trains. It is in evidence in this case that other laborers were present on the yard that morning. Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as the law requires us to do on a nonsuit, it is a reasonable inference that the child was there in the performance of the duty of carrying messages from one office to another across these tracks at the time of his death. It is not shown that he had occasion to go there for any other purpose, nor is it reasonable to suppose that after his arduous labors on these other days he would have revisited this spot on the morning in question as a matter of sport or play. The child was killed where he was required to do his work. If for any reason he was not at work at that spot on that day, it was the duty of the defendant to show it, and it could have readily done so, if such was the fact. It did not attempt to make such proof.

It was also suggested that the child might have been killed by jumping up on one of the passing trains. One witness testified that he saw him riding on one of the shifting trains that morning. But there is no evidence that he was killed while doing so, and, even if it had been shown that he was killed while so riding, this would have been contributory negligence, which this court held in Ward v. O'Dell, 126 N. C. 948, 32 S. E. 194, could not be set up against a child under 12 years of age. Besides, contributory negligence must be proven by the defendant. Revisal, § 483. The court refers to "statements in the answer" as if the answer was evidence.

If we are to observe Judge Daniels' wise injunction, quoted by the court, "that we should not be wiser than the law," we will not reverse the humane decisions of this court, above quoted, in order to defeat a recovery for the death of the little sufferer who by the avarice of the defendant was sent to his death by exposure to an accumulation of perils greater to him in his unguarded and unwarned innocence than that which met the charging column of brave men on Cemetery Ridge. Many soldiers survived four years of war. This child was slain on the fourth day of his employment.

It may be asked, and it will be asked, by future ages as well as by the present, why an innocent child of this immature age should have been subjected to such perils, so far beyond his comprehension. This record gives the answer. His mother had seven other children to support. He had a stepfather. And, in this combination of circumstances, the mother testifying that she did not know the dangerous nature nor the character of the employment, and indeed did not consent to his being employed, the defendant was able to procure this child's services for the munifirent sum of $12.50 per month. This was truly "the price of innocent blood." Had the defendant employed a man or a boy of maturer years, it would have had to pay a sum for his services more in proportion to the peril. Such a person would have known the dangers and would have charged for the risk.

By employing these little children the defendant is able to cheapen to that extent, by the competition, the price of other labor.

Nor is there any reason shown why the defendant company should not have put telephones across these tracks, and thus transmitted the messages without exposing any one to such dangers. The only answer to this is the one that was ineffectually made in the Troxler Case (124 N. C. 189, 32 S. E. 550, 44 L. R. A. 313, 70 Am. St. Rep. 580) and Greenlee Case (122 N. C. 977, 30 S. E. 115, 41 L. R. A. 399, 65 Am. St. Rep. 734) that it would have cost the defendant company some expenditure to put in the automatic couplers, as here it would cost a little something to put in the telephones. This court held, without any statute, but upon the principles of right and justice, in the Troxler and Greenlee Cases, that it was negligence per se to subject a grown man to the danger of making a coupling without using automatic couplers, even when the man was instructed as to the danger, and that in such cases the railroad company could not set up the defenses of assumption of risk or contributory negligence. This decision has been followed in other states and is a well-settled law in our own courts. Our law is humane.

Chief Justice Fuller not long before his death, in a case of personal injury, in words of burning conviction said: "It is a reproach to our civilization that any class of American workmen should, in the pursuit of a necessary and useful vocation, be subject to a peril of life and limb as great as that of a soldier in time of war." Johnson v. R. R. 196 U. S. 1, 25 Sup. Ct. 158, 49 L. Ed. 363. A conservative estimate of the number of workmen killed or maimed in this country every year in industrial accidents is about 500,000. It is said that the total number killed and wounded in the Union Army during the Civil War was 385,325. In other words, the whole Confederate Army was unable to kill and cripple as many Union men in four years as are now killed and crippled in industrial employment in a single year.

We cannot expect this condition to improve if the courts can be induced to place the blame upon those killed and wounded, because in order to make a livelihood, and with a purpose of obeying those for whom they labor, they venture in dangerous pursuits, while under such conditions the same courts relieve the master, who created the condition and gave the orders, of all liability and blame whatsoever.

The courts elsewhere have not yielded their assent to the validity of the considerations urged by the defendant in this case.

In Melaske v. Coal Co., 86 Wis. 220, 56 N.

W. 475, it was held: "The presumption is that a boy under 14 years of age is not competent to perform duties involving personal safety and requiring the exercise of a good degree of judgment and constant care and watchfulness; and, in an action for injuries resulting from negligence of a boy so employed, the burden is upon his employer to show that he was in fact competent. Further, no usage to employ boys of such tender years to perform such duties can be upheld." Here the boy was under 12, instead of 14, no negligence by him was shown, and no usage to employ boys of such age for such duties.

In Wynne v. Conklin, 86 Ga. 40, 12 S. E. 183, it was held: "Whether a boy of 13 employed by the defendant to work in a tinshop was of sufficient age and capacity to appreciate his hazard and provide against danger is for the consideration of the jury." In this case the boy was under 12, and the danger to which he was exposed was full an hundredfold greater than that in a tinshop, and a North Carolina jury in all justice should have considered and determined the question whether he was "of sufficient age and capacity to appreciate his hazard and provide against the danger" to which he was exposed.

In Goff v. Railroad (C. C.) 36 Fed. 299, it was held an act of negligence on the part of a railroad company to take into its employment as a brakeman a minor of such tender years as to not know the risk of the service.

The rule established by Bare v. Coal Co., 61 W. Va. 28, 55 S. E. 907, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 284, 123 Am. St. Rep. 966, that "it is actionable negligence for an employer to engage and place at a dangerous employment a minor who lacks sufficient age and capacity to comprehend and avoid the dangers of such employment, even though the employer instructs him as to the dangers incident to the work," is a well-established rule, being laid down in Labatt on Master & Servant, § 251; S. & Redf. Neg. (5th Ed.) § 219; 4 Thomp. Neg. §§ 3826, 4093, 4689; Bailey, Pers. Inj. §§ 2758-2777; Dresser, Employers' Liability, 466; Buswell, Pers. Inj. § 203; 2 Cooley, Torts (3d Ed.) 1130, 1131; 20 A. & E. Enc. (3d Ed.) 299.

It is a question for the jury to say whether or not the deceased could appreciate the dangers and knew how to avoid them. Turner v. Railroad, 40 W. Va. 675, 22 S. E. 83; 4 Thomp. Neg. § 4098.

The place where the child was put to work being a dangerous one, the question was open for the jury to pass upon the negligence of the defendant. Cahill v. Stone Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 Pac. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094; Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29; Pressly v. Yarn Mills, 138 N. C. 410, 51 S. E. 69.

In this case a child under 12 years of age, undergrown, and therefore known to be immature, was set to work by the defendant in a most dangerous place, exposed to be run over by the constantly passing trains and shifting engines crossing 18 or more tracks, to carry messages which might have been sent by telephone. He was found dead on the track in the yard with his leg cut off. Under our decisions the company could not show contributory negligence and did not offer to show any. It was the duty of the company to show that they had instructed any employé, much more a child placed in such employment, of its dangers. The defendant did not show this. The work was of a nature which required employment on Sunday as on other days. The child being found dead where he would be passing in carrying his messages, if he was not at work that day the burden was upon the defendant to show it. The defendant did not offer to do so. Upon all the evidence, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, it would seem impossible to conclude that there was not more than a scintilla of evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant.

HOKE, J., concurs in result.

L. Clayton Grant, for appellant. T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., and G. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The prisoner was convicted of murder in the first degree in killing his wife. The evidence is that the wife had left her husband after a quarrel and moved to another house where she kept boarders.

On the day of the homicide the prisoner went to his wife's house. After some conversation, he commenced beating his wife. She screamed and ran from the dining room into the parlor. The defendant followed, beating her. She ran from the parlor into the hall, and the prisoner still followed her. When she got into the hall, the prisoner pulled out his pistol and shot her three times, twice in the back and once in the neck. The doctor testified that either shot would have killed her. She fell, and the prisoner stepped over the body and out into the porch and shot himself in the head but not seriously. One Moss, who occupied an adjoining room, said to him, "Throw that pistol down." He threw it down on the porch, and Moss picked it up. The prisoner then said, "I killed her, and I intended to kill her." The coroner, who was also a physician, testified as to the pistol shots, and on cross-examination testified that he did not consider the prisoner at all insane. The prisoner offered no testimony, asked for no special instructions, and took no exceptions to the charge.

[1] The prisoner in his brief relies upon the second assignment of error. The trial began on Saturday of the first week of the term. The regular panel of that week was exhausted. When the court met again on Monday, the regular jurors who had been drawn, for service during the second week, by virtue of a special act for New Hanover (chapter 342, Laws 1909), were called. The first juror who was tendered was challenged on the ground that this act did not apply to capital cases, but that a special venire should have been drawn under Rev. §§ 1973, 1974. The act in question provides that jurors so drawn "shall be regular jurors and subject only to the challenges now allowed by law to regular jurors." This also disposes of the assignments of error 3, 4, 6, and 7, which were because the judge held that such jurors were regular jurors and not subject to challenge as talesmen.

[2] The other assignments of error which were not abandoned need not be mentioned, except the fifteenth, which was because, insanity at the trial being insisted on, the judge at the instance of the prisoner allowed his plea to be amended to allege it, and thereupon submitted to the jury the double issue as to the prisoner's insanity at the trial and as to his guilt.

[3] The double issue was submitted without exception at the time, and was therefore waived unless it was inherently prejudicial. In State v. Haywood, 94 N. C. 847, the court, while not approving such practice, held that it was not error in law, stating that this practice had been pursued in other trials, citing Rex v. Little, Russ. & R. 430; Regina v. Southey, 4 Foster & Fin. 864; Buswell on Insanity, § 461.

We do not see how any prejudice could have arisen to the prisoner on this occasion. Insanity at the time of the homicide could of course be set up as a defense on the other issue as to the prisoner's guilt.

The record as sent up recited that the jury returned a verdict "guilty of the felony and murder in manner and form as charged in the bill of indictment." The brief of the prisoner objected to a judgment on such verdict as his last assignment of error. The court ex mero motu sent down an instantur certiorari, to which the clerk returned that the entry on the docket showed that the jury returned their verdict in writing as follows: "(1) Is the defendant now insane? Answer: No. (2) Is the defendant guilty of the felony and murder of which he stands charged? Answer: Guilty of murder in the first degree."

As the judge filed as a part of the record his formal judgment in which he recited that the jury "rendered the verdict as appears of record, finding the said L. M. Sandlin guilty of murder in the first degree," it is not easy to understand how so material an error in the transcript could have occurred. This being an appeal in forma pauperis, it is possible that the transcript may have been copied by another, and the very careful and painstaking clerk must have been inadvertent to the omission of the exact form of the verdict as rendered. It is the duty of the clerk to certify that the transcript is "a true, full, and perfect transcript of the record," and too much care cannot be taken by clerks to verify the correctness of the transcript in all cases, both civil and criminal.

The homicide in any phase of the evidence, if believed by the jury, was murder in the first degree, and one of peculiar atrocity. If there are extenuating circumstances, they do not appear in this record. There could hardly be any extenuating circumstances, if the evidence sent up is a true statement of the occurrence.

No error.

CARTERET LODGE v. JAMES et al.

INJUNCTION (§ 163*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—STATUTORY AUTHORITY TO GRANT.

Where plaintiff, suing to restrain the cutting of timber on land claimed by him, shows an apparent title, and satisfies the court that his claim is made in good faith, the court, under Revisal 1905, §§ 806-809, will continue the restraining order preventing the cutting of timber until the hearing; and it is not necessary to show the insolvency of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 357-371; Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Carteret Lodge against John T. James and another. From an order denying a motion to dissolve a restraining order pending hearing, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Civil action heard on motion to dissolve a restraining order issued to prevent the cutting of timber by defendants, on lands alleged to belong to plaintiff. There was judgment, continuing the restraining order to the hearing, and defendants excepted and appealed.

W. D. McIver, E. H. Gorham, C. R. Wheatley, and Abernethy & Davis, for appellants. F. L. Fuller and Gulon & Guion, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The statutes of the state, in reference to cases of this character (Revisal, §§ 806-809), as construed and interpreted by the court, are to the effect that when a litigant shows an apparent title, and satisfies the court that his claim is made in good faith, the restraining order will be continued to the hearing; and there is special provision made that an allegation of insolvency, on the part of the defendant, to that time usually regarded as essential is no longer required. The purpose and policy of this legislation are well stated by Associate Justice Brown, in Moore v. Fowler, 139 N. C. 52, 51 S. E. 797, as follows: "The rapidly increasing value of timber trees doubtless prompted the Legislature of 1885 to enact chapter 401; but the efficacy of this act was diminished by the general practice of permitting the defendant to give bond and to cut the timber pendente lite, or otherwise to appoint a receiver and permit the rental value or stumpage to be paid to him. The Legislature of 1901 has thrown greater safeguards around the rights of such litigants, and now, when the plaintiff satisfies the judge that his claim is bona fide, and that he can show an apparent title to the timber, the judge should not dissolve the injunction, but continue it until the title can be finally determined." In same opinion it is further said: "On such hearings, the title is not required to be proved with that strictness and certainty as upon the trial." And there are several decisions of the court in accord with the position. Lumber Co. v. Cedar Co., 142 N. C. 418, 55 S. E. 304; Alleghany Co. v. Lumber Co., 131 N. C. 6, 42 S. E. 331. Applying the principle, we are of opinion that his honor made a correct ruling in continuing the restraining order to the hearing.

As the case goes back for trial, we do not consider it desirable to make any detailed statement of the relevant facts in evidence; but, speaking generally, a perusal of the testimony will disclose that in August, 1891, one N. M. Journey and wife executed to plaintiff a deed for a large body of land in Carteret county, and purporting to cover the locus in quo by metes and bounds, and the evidence on part of plaintiff tended to show that said plaintiff, through its tenants, agents, and employes, had been in the continuous possession and occupation of the property from the date of the deed. There were several affidavits on the part of plaintiff, from which it was made to appear further that this deed from Jurney covered the same property that had formerly belonged to David S. Jones and his son, Julius F. Jones, under whom the plaintiff claimed, and that these parties occupied the land since 1851, under deeds describing same, not by course and distance, as in the Jurney deed, but by natural boundaries, stated in the deeds, and which would accord with the descriptions in the Jurney deeds and cover the same land. There was much evidence, on part of defendant, controverting these allegations and tending to show that plaintiff's deeds, prior to the Jurney deed, did not cover the land in controversy, and further that neither before nor since said deed had there been any such occupation and possession by plaintiff or its agents as would serve to mature the title; but it clearly appears, as stated, that the claim of plaintiff is made in good faith and with sufficient evidence, tending to show title, to require that the restraining order be continued to the hearing.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The judgment of his honor to that effect is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

BISSETT v. BRYANT LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 4, 1911.)

1. SALES (§ 358*)—ISSUES—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for the price of lumber, the issue involved the quantity of lumber shipped, evidence of the quantity of lumber on the cars at the buyer's mill was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 358.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 166*)—BEST AND SECONDARY.

Where, on the issue of the quantity of lumber in several cars, a witness testified that he had measured the lumber, and the tally book showing the measurements of the various pieces of lumber made by the witness was received in evidence, it was error to prevent a competent witness from making calculations as to the quantity of lumber from the book and give the result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 556, 557; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by C. F. Bissett against the Bryant Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

This is an action to recover $164.66, alleged to be due for nine cars of lumber, sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. Eight cars of the lumber were shipped by rail to the mill of the defendant, and one car was shipped elsewhere. The principal controversy between the parties was as to the quantity of lumber in the shipment of eight cars; the defendant claiming it was 19,669 feet less than the quantity claimed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove that the lumber was measured and counted as it was placed on the cars, and that the full amount claimed by him was delivered. In rebuttal the defendant introduced J. W. Burnette, who testified that he was employed by the defendant at the time the lumber was received from plaintiff, and that it was his duty to tally and measure the lumber received by the defendant; that he measured and tallied each car of lumber received from plaintiff as the lumber was taken from the car, except the one car sold at $11, which was not unloaded at the mill of the defendant; that the aggregate amount of lumber taken from the eight cars measured and tallied by him was 85,638 feet; that each piece of lumber taken from the car was measured and tallied on the books produced by the witness and put in evidence by the defendant. Witness stated that he called off from the tally of said lumber made off said books the amount of each piece of lumber so measured and tallied by him to W. W. Briggs; that he and Mr. Briggs worked up the amount of lumber taken from the tally made by witness; that the amount aggregated 85,638 feet; that the tallies on the books offered in evidence showed all the lumber received from plaintiff by defendant (not taking into account the car which was not counted at the mill but was shipped elsewhere without being unloaded), save and except less than 1,000 feet which was less than 4 inches wide (the contract calling for more than 4 inches), or that had so much bark on it that it was not merchantable. The defendant offered W. W. Briggs as a witness. He testified that he had been over the figures in the tally book with Burnette, and had worked out the amount of lumber, according to the tally, but that he had no recollection of the amount, independent of the book, which was in the handwriting of Burnette and was in evidence. He was then asked to state how the figures, as he worked them out, compared with the figures testified to by Burnette. Upon objection, the court would not permit the witness to answer. The tally book was handed to the witness with the request "to figure up each piece and tell how much was in each car according to the tally made by Burnette, and read over to him, and say from the tally in the books how it corresponded with the testimony of Burnette." His honor excluded this evidence, and the plaintiff excepted. There was a judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Daniels & Swindell, for appellant. Pou & Finch, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). In our opinion the evidence excluded by the court was important and material.

[1] The evidence of the quantity of lumber on the cars at the mill was not conclusive as to the quantity shipped by the plaintiff, but it was a fact which, if established according to the defendant's contention, would have been entitled to consideration by the jury.

[2] The witness Burnette had testified that he counted and measured the lumber on the cars, and that it aggregated 85,638 feet. There were eight cars of the lumber, necessarily of various sizes and dimensions, and the plaintiff was contesting the correctness of the count. When the quantity of lumber is considered, it is apparent that it was impossible for the jurors to remember the tallies of lumber as they were read from the book, and to make their own calculations from memory, and it has been held by us, at this term, in Nicholson v. Lumber Co., 72 S. E. 86, that his honor, who presided at the trial, did not have the right to permit the jury to take the book to their room. If, therefore, the defendant could not introduce a competent witness and let him make the calculations and give the result to the jury, it would have to rely entirely on the evidence of Burnette. The evidence throws light upon the question in issue, and tends to corroborate the statement of the defendant's witness as to the correctness of his calculations.

A similar question was considered by the Supreme Court of Maryland in Lynn v. Cumberland, 77 Md. 459, 26 Atl. 1004, and the court there says: "It would have been impossible for the jury to carry these figures in their minds if they had been merely read off by the witness to them; and, had the jurors undertaken to transcribe them for the purpose of adding them up themselves, the trial would have been greatly and needlessly protracted."

Also in West Chicago v. Sheer, 8 Ill. App. 370: "It is further objected that the court erred in allowing a witness to make a computation and testify as to the amount of interest due. This objection is without any force. The evidence is admitted merely to aid the jury in making a more speedy computation, and thereby to facilitate the dispatch of business. The jury are not bound by the computation thus made by the witness, as it seems they were not in the present instance, but are themselves to ultimately determine what is the true amount of the plaintiff's damages."

There are other exceptions in the record, which we need not consider, as they are not likely to arise on another trial.

There must be a new trial.

New trial.

MORGAN v. MORGAN.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 35*)—REMOVAL—GROUNDS.

In the absence of bad faith by an administrator, a mere claim by a distributee that intestate owned a half interest in personalty in the administrator's possession was not ground for the administrator's removal, where the value of such property had been ascertained and evidence thereof preserved, and the administrator had given a solvent bond sufficient to cover the value of intestate's property, including that in the administrator's possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Carter, Judge.

Proceeding by J. H. Morgan against W. G. Morgan. From a judgment for complainant, defendant appeals. Reversed.

This is a proceeding under section 38, Rev. 1905, for the removal of defendant administrator, commended by J. H. Morgan, a brother of the defendant and a distributee of the intestate. The clerk of the superior court of Nash county denied the motion. Petitioner appealed. His honor, Judge Carter, made this ruling: It is therefore found as a fact by the court from the evidence that, in respect of the ownership of said property, the administrator has and asserts a personal interest adverse to that of the estate of his intestate, and the court is therefore of opinion, as matter of law, that the said W. G. Morgan is not a proper party to administer said estate on account of his adverse personal interest as aforesaid. The defendant appealed.

E. B. Grantham, for appellant. Finch & Vaughan and Jacob Battle, for appellee.

BROWN, J. As his honor rests his judgment solely upon a matter of law, it is not denied that it is reviewable upon appeal.

The petitioner and the defendant are the only heirs at law and distributees of Patsy Morgan, deceased. The record discloses that Patsy M. Morgan owned a one-half undivided interest in a tract of land of about 100 acres, and, as the defendant contends, only a very small amount of personal property. The defendant is a man 50 years old, who has never married. He and his sister, intestate, resided together after the death of their parents upon the old homestead, and their younger brother, J. H. Morgan, married when a young man and moved away. Some weeks after this defendant qualified as administrator, and after the defendant had filed his inventory in the course of his said administration, the plaintiff raised the contention that certain personal property in the possession of this defendant belonged jointly to the late Patsy M. Morgan and to the defendant, W. G. Morgan. The defendant denied that Patsy M. Morgan had any interest in the personal property in controversy, consisting of mules, hogs, farming implements, etc. The record shows that, when this claim was made by the petitioner, the defendant allowed the plaintiff to have an inspection and appraisal of all the property which the plaintiff contended belonged jointly to the said late Patsy M. Morgan and the defendant. The appraisal committee inspected, valued, and took an itemized statement of all of the property, and every portion of same has been held intact by the defendant and is still so held by him. It is admitted that the defendant has given a solvent bond amply sufficient to cover the full value of his intestate's estate, including the value of the property in dispute.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexer

There are no findings of bad faith upon the part of the defendant, and we are of opinion that his honor erred in his conclusion that he was incompetent to act as administrator simply because a distributee claimed that the intestate owned a half interest in certain personal property in possession of the defendant. The items and value of that property have been carefully ascertained and the evidence of it preserved. There is a good and sufficient bond to protect the petitioner, and upon a final settlement he will have opportunity to make good his claim, and charge the administrator with the intestate's share of the property in dispute, if he succeeds.

The defendant was properly appointed by the clerk as administrator in obedience to a statute which in many respects is mandatory and provides who is entitled to letters of administration in case of intestacy. The administrator cannot be removed solely because he has personal property in his possession in which it is claimed his intestate had a half interest, in the absence of any findings of bad faith and fraudulent concealment. We think the learned judge below mistook the true purport of the case upon which he relied. Simpson v. Jones, 82 N. C. 323, 325. In that case the administrator was removed because his fidelity and good faith was successfully challenged. He failed to make a defense to a suit brought against his intestate's estate, because he had a personal interest in the recovery, and the administrator alone could make such defense. The court said. "The distributees are entitled to have an efficient defense to the action made in both answer and proofs, and it is apparent the defendant has not come up to his measure of official obligation." In the case at bar the distributee is at no disadvantage. He may contest the title to this property in dispute in a proceeding by himself against the defendant and his bond for a final accounting and settlement of the estate.

In the case of In re Dixon, 72 S. E. 72, at this term, we directed the removal of a guardian because he set up an unwarranted claim to his ward's real property and gave no account of its rents and profits. His ward is his own child and helpless to assert her claim to the present income of her property against him. It was manifest she needed some disinterested person to assert her rights for her.

The judgment of the judge of the superior court is reversed, and the judgment of the clerk affirmed.

Reversed.

HOWIE v. SPITTLE.

1. EXECUTION (§ 431*)—EXECUTION AGAINST THE PERSON—JURISDICTION TO ISSUE.

Revisal 1905, § 727, provides for arrest in an action of tort, and section 625 provides that when execution against a judgment debtor, in an action in which defendant might have been arrested, is returned unsatisfied, an execution against his person may issue, and section 598 provides for a stay of execution by a bond. After judgment for a tort against defendant and the return of an execution against property unsatisfied, the court issued execution on which defendant, who had not given the bond provided by section 598, was arrested. Held, that the only method of staying execution was that provided by section 598, and that the superior court had jurisdiction to issue the final process for arrest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1212; Dec. Dig. § 431.*]

2. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 17*)—PROCEEDINGS REVIEWABLE — COMMITMENT ON EXECUTION AGAINST PERSON.

Under the express provisions of Revisal 1905, § 1822, subsec. 2, a petitioner imprisoned under a final process of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot sue out a writ of habeas corpus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

3. EXECUTION (§ 442*)—RELEASE FROM COMMITMENT ON EXECUTION AGAINST PERSON.

A petitioner confined upon a writ of execution against the person is not entitled to give bail pending his appeal to this court in a civil action.

Certiorari to Superior Court, Union County; Ferguson, Judge.

Certiorari by Henry Spittle, by his guardian ad litem, to revise the action of the superior court in denying a writ of habeas corpus. Affirmed.

The following is the order sought to be reviewed: "The above guardian ad litem having filed his petition that his ward be discharged from the custody of the sheriff of Union county, and upon said petition being heard, and it appearing to the court that the action was for tort, and that final judgment was rendered at the August term of Union superior court, in which judgment it was provided for execution to issue against the property of said Henry S. Spittle, and, if the judgment could not be collected by execution against his property, that execution should issue against the person of the said Henry Spittle, the execution against the property having been returned, showing that no property of the said Henry Spittle could be found subject to such execution, execution issued against the person, by reason of which and the said final judgment the sheriff of Union county has the said Henry Spittle in custody in the common jail of Union county. The court is of the opinion that it has not the power under law to grant the writ of habeas corpus whether prayed for by the guardian ad litem or the said Henry Spittle. The petitioner excepts and appeals to the Supreme Court. The petitioner prays the court to grant bail pending the appeal to the Supreme Court. The court is of the opinion that under the law it has not the power to grant bail, to which the petitioner excepts, and appeals to the Supreme Court."

Williams, Lemmond & Love, for petitioner. Stack & Parker, opposed.

BROWN, J. [1] The petitioner is the defendant in a civil action brought against him by Ruth Howie for an injury to her person, a tort, according to the complaint. Upon issue joined she obtained a verdict and judgment for $250. The petitioner appealed to the Supreme Court, which appeal has not yet been heard. He gave no bond to stay execution, so an execution was issued against his property, which was returned unsatisfied. An execution was issued against his person under which he was taken in custody and confined in the jail of Union county. Before he was arrested, he filed an inventory of his property and a list of his creditors, as provided by section 1930, Revisal 1905, and attached his affidavit thereto, and asked to be exempt from arrest. We will not review the correctness of the judgment rendered, nor consider the exceptions taken on the trial. They will be passed upon, and the assignments of error considered when the appeal is heard.

The only question we can now consider is as to the jurisdiction of the court to render the judgment and issue the final process under which the petitioner has been arrested. The cause of action, as set out, is an injury to the person of the plaintiff in the execution, which is a tort, and under Revisal, §§ 625, 727, when an execution against property is returned unsatisfied, an execution against the person may issue upon such judgment. When the appeal was taken, the law provided but one method of staying execution, and that was by giving a bond securing the judgment. This the petitioner has failed to do. Revisal, § 598, and cases cited.

[2] The superior court had complete jurisdiction to render the judgment, and therefore the petitioner is imprisoned under the final process of a court of competent jurisdiction. Under such conditions the writ of habeas corpus may not successfully be sued out. The statute forbids it. Revisal, § 1822, subsec. 2; Ledford v. Emerson, 143 N. C. 536, 55 S. E. 969, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 362. The petitioner contends that he is entitled to his discharge under the insolvent debtor's law. There are two methods provided in the Revisal for the discharge of insolvent debtors. One relates to those under arrest. Section 1920 et seq. The other relates to defendants in civil actions not under arrest. Section 1930 et seq. The petitioner was not under arrest when he filed his petition, and there is nothing in the record to show that he has complied with the provisions of sections 1930 to 1933. To avail himself of that act he must show a valid order of discharge from imprisonment under sections 1932 and 1933. It is not claimed that he has complied with sections 1920 to 1929.

[3] We agree with the judge below that the petitioner is not entitled to give bail pending his appeal to this court in the civil action, but he may give bond to stay execution. There is no provision of law authorizing bail in lieu of such bond, although there is a provision for his giving bail before the clerk of the superior court of Union county during the pendency of and until the final determination of the proceedings under the insolvent debtor's act. Rev. § 1936.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by Josephine F. Adams against the Kinston & Carolina Railroad & Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action is to recover damages on account of the death of the plaintiff's intestate, which it is alleged was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The defendant denies negligence, and alleges that the intestate was guilty of contributory negligence. The intestate was killed on the 24th day of January, 1910, which was on Monday, while on the train of the defendant, by a collision between the train and two box cars, which had been left on the track of the defendant on the preceding Saturday evening. There was evidence that the intestate was foreman of the track of the defendant, and that he was going out on the train to work on the track. The plaintiff contended that he was on the train by direction of one Weeks, a representative of the defendant, and that he knew nothing of the two cars on the track. The defendant contended that Weeks had no authority to act for it; that the intestate had been ordered by one Hayes to go out Monday morning with the regular engineer Sanderson; that he disobeyed this order and went with the fireman, one Davis; that the intestate was in charge of the train on Monday, and on the Saturday preceding; and that he knew the cars were on the track. At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit, which was denied, and the defendant excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

G. V. Cowper and Rouse & Land, for appellant. E. R. Wooten, McLean, Varser & McLean, and Loftin & Dawson, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. There is ample evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant.

[1] The collision raises a presumption of negligence. Kinney v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 361, 30 S. E. 313; Marcom v. Railroad, 126

N. C. 200, 35 S. E. 423; Wright v. Railroad, 127 N. C. 229, 37 S. E. 221; Stewart v. Railroad, 137 N. C. 689, 50 S. E. 312.

[2] In addition to this presumption, there is evidence that the train was running backward, before daylight, with no man or light on the rear car, which is evidence of negligence. The defendant says, however, that these principles do not militate against its contention, and that, upon the whole evidence, a judgment of nonsuit ought to have been entered.

[3] Its counsel says in his brief: "The vital questions, therefore, arising in this appeal, are: (1) Did Weeks assume authority to act as conductor on the morning in question? (2) If so, did the defendant authorize him to so act or knowingly acquiesce in his assumption of authority to such an extent as to ratify what he did and become responsible for his conduct? (3) Even granting, for the sake of argument, that the first and second propositions could be answered affirmatively, then as a matter of law could Adams, knowing that Hayes was superintendent and was the representative of the defendant who had employed him, disobey the express and specific orders of Hayes, a superior officer, in order to carry out the orders of Weeks, admittedly an inferior to Hayes (even if it could be said that he had any connection with the defendant)? (4) It appearing in the plaintiff's own testimony that Adams knew Weeks was not conductor on the morning of the injury, the testimony of the plaintiff showing that one Singleton had been employed the Friday before and that Weeks was no longer assuming to hold the position, could said Adams proceed to obey Weeks' orders except at his own peril?" If we understood the evidence as the defendant's counsel construes it, we might agree with his conclusion, but we do not. In our opinion there is evidence that Weeks had authority to control the movement of the train, and that the intestate was not acting in violation of directions given him by Hayes. There is also evidence that the intestate did not know that the cars were on the track. A witness for the plaintiff, C. C. Bell, testifies that Weeks was acting as assistant conductor and manager of the defendant; that he gave instructions to Davis, who was the acting engineer, as to the movements of the train; that Davis acted on his orders; that Weeks had been acting as conductor of the train; that the train was running backward at the time of the collision, with no light or man on the rear; and that he was on the train with the intestate on Saturday, and that the intestate was at that time making up his pay rolls, and did not know the cars were left on the track. He also testifies to being present on Sunday and hearing the conversation between the superintendent, Hayes, and the intestate, as follows: "Q.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Where was it Mr. Hayes gave you instructions on Sunday? A. At the office. Q. Who else? A. Mr. Adams and myself. Q. You say Mr. Hayes told Mr. Adams to take Davis as engineer? A. No, sir; I didn't say so. Q. Did he tell you to put the hand car on top of the flat car? A. Yes. Q. What time was this? A. Somewhere between 11 and 12 o'clock. Q. Why did you go there on Sunday? A. It was the usual thing. Mr. Adams would go down on Sunday between 11 and 12 o'clock to get orders for Monday. That was Mr. Hayes' order to go down on Sunday and get orders for Monday." The regular engineer was sick, and for this reason did not run the train on Monday, and Weeks knew this. Another witness testified he had heard Weeks give orders as to the running of the trains in the presence of Hayes without objection or protest.

[4.] There was evidence on the part of the defendant directly contradicting the evidence of the plaintiff, but we cannot pass on this conflict of evidence, and for the purpose of the motion for nonsuit must accept the evidence of the plaintiff to be true.

Upon a review of the record, we find no error.

No error.

Where defendant railroad company, in constructing its roadbed, conveyed water from its natural course by lateral ditches into a stream flowing through plaintiff's land, and thereby caused the stream to overflow onto plaintiff's land, to his damage, defendant was liable for permanent damages so caused.

3. PARTIES (§ 52*)—NEW PARTIES—ADDITION PENDING SUIT.

Where land, alleged to have been damaged by a railroad's increase of the flow of a water course, was held under a deed to H. and wife, and the question determined related to permanent damages, the wife was a proper, if not a necessary, party, and, in the absence of any suggestion of surprise by defendant, it was proper to permit her to be joined after the jury was impaneled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Geo. W. Ward, Judge.

Action by T. E. Hooker against the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

There was allegation, with evidence, on the part of plaintiff, tending to show that defendant company, in the construction of its roadbed, had wrongfully diverted surface waters from their natural watershed, "caused same to flow into Patrick's branch or Hardee's run," rendering same "insufficient and incapable of discharging said waters by reason of the increased servitude put upon them by said wrongful act, thereby causing said branch or run to overflow and pond back its waters upon plaintiff's land, to his great damage," etc. The allegations were denied, and evidence offered by defendant to support such denial, and tending further to show that the injuries complained of were in great part caused by a failure to clear out the run below said land, and were not properly attributable to any wrongful diversion of water by defendant. On issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict: "(1) Did the defendant, in digging its lateral ditches in the construction of its railroad, wrongfully cause water to be diverted in and down Patrick's run, and thereby injure and damage the lands of plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (2) What permanent damages has plaintiff sustained thereby? Answer: $600." Judgment on the verdict, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Moore & Long, for appellant. F. G. James & Son, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] It is now well established with us that "water cannot be diverted, but may be increased and accelerated." The principle obtains in respect to both corporations and individual owners of property, and has been applied and illustrated in many well-considered decisions of the court. Roberts v. Baldwin, 151 N. C. 407, 66 S. E. 346; Mizell v. McGowan, 129 N. C. 93, 39 S. E. 729, 85 Am. St. Rep. 705; Hocutt v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 214, 32 S. E. 681; Parker v. Railroad, 123 N. C. 71, 31 S. E. 381. Stated in a way more directly relevant, it was held, in Hocutt's Case, supra, that: "Neither a corporation nor an individual can divert water from its natural course, so as to damage another; neither can they cut ditches through a watershed and conduct water to a water course, insufficient to carry it off, whereby the water is flooded upon the lands of another." There was testimony on the part of plaintiff, tending to show that the defendant company, in making its roadbed, had, by lateral ditches, conveyed water from its natural course and watershed into a stream called Patrick's branch, or Hardee's run, a natural water course, flowing through plaintiff's lands, and had thereby overcharged said stream, causing same to overflow and pond back upon said lands, to plaintiff's great damage. There was much testimony on the part of defendant in denial and rebuttal of plaintiff's evidence, and tending to show that there had been no diversion of water into said run, and that the injury complained of was caused in fact and in truth by a failure to properly clear said run of obstructions therein, upon and below the lands of plaintiff. Under a clear and comprehensive charge, in which the principles applicable were correctly stated by the court, the jury have accepted the plaintiff's version of the case, and we find no error that gives defendant any just ground of complaint. We cannot approve the position that recovery should be denied because the diverted water, before reaching plaintiff's lands, where the damage occurred, first passed through the ditches of an adjoining proprietor. Under the charge, the jury have found that the injury was caused by reason of the water being diverted, and on the facts in evidence we do not see that the existence of these ditches could prevent the said diversion from being the proximate cause of the injury. The position, however, is not open to defendant, on this testimony, for it appeared that the ditches in question were enlarged by the neighbor, at the instance of defendant, and the work was paid for by the company, in order to provide for the increased flow of water. The court also laid down the correct rule as to the admeasurement of damages, and the charge was fully responsive to defendant's prayer for instruction on that question.

[2] It is well recognized that a prayer for instructions need not be given in its exact language, if the general charge is sufficiently responsive, and gives a correct statement of the law applicable to the question presented. Patterson v. McIver, 90 N. C. 493; Edwards v. Phifer, 121 N. C. 391, 28 S. E. 548.

[3] Nor is the objection well founded that the wife of the original plaintiff, T. E. Hooker, was joined as coplaintiff after the jury was impaneled. True it has been held in this state "that a court has no power to convert a pending action that cannot be maintained into a new one by admitting a new party plaintiff, who is solely interested." Merrill v. Merrill, Adm'x, 92 N. C. 657. But no such case is presented here. The land alleged to be damaged was held under a deed to T. E. Hooker and his wife, and, while it seems the husband might have proceeded alone, if the same had been prosecuted for a simple trespass (West v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 620, 53 S. E. 477), inasmuch as the question was submitted and determined on an issue as to permanent damages, the wife was a desirable, and perhaps a necessary, party, in order that on payment of permanent damages an easement might pass to the defendant.

Porter v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 563, 62 S. E. 741. There was no suggestion, certainly no indication, of any surprise by reason of this change of parties. So far as appears, the witnesses on the issues were the same in the one case as in the other, and the entire matter seems to have been fully presented to the jury. We find no reason for disturbing the conclusion they have reached, and the judgment on the verdict must be affirmed.

No error.

McLAWHORN et al. v. HARRIS et ux.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 4, 1911.)

1. JURY (§ 83*)—QUALIFICATIONS—DEPUTY SHERIFF.

While it is improper for a deputy sheriff, who summons jurors, mingles with, and has charge of, them, to serve as a juror during the term of court he is acting for the sheriff, his duties as such do not disqualify him to so serve.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 403; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 362*)—TRUST DEEDS—FORECLOSURE—PURCHASE BY BENEFICIARY.

Where a sale under a deed of trust was made to the highest bidder without any fraud, it was no objection that the property was purchased by one of the beneficiaries under the deed, under the rule that the holder of the bonds secured by a deed of trust may bid at a sale by the trustee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1060-1084; Dec. Dig. § 362.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 372*)—DEED OF TRUST—FORECLOSURE—CONVEYANCE BY PURCHASER.

Evidence that one of the beneficiaries under a deed of trust purchased the land at a sale by the trustee on foreclosure, on March 24, 1894, and conveyed the land to one of the grantors in the deed on the 28th of the following May, for the same price that the grantors in the deed had agreed to pay for the land, did not require a finding, as a matter of law, that the purchaser at the sale purchased for his subsequent grantee, and not for himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 372.*]

4. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 19*)—OUTSTANDING TITLE.

A cotenant, while the relation exists, may not acquire an outstanding title or lien on the common property and hold it for his exclusive benefit; and if he acquires title from a sale under a deed of trust, made by all the cotenants for a debt binding all, and the sale is caused by his failure to pay his share of the debt, he cannot hold the land against his cotenants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

5. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 8*)—DEED OF TRUST—FORECLOSURE—TERMINATION OF TENANCY—PURCHASE BY COTENANT.

Where land held in common was sold on foreclosure of a deed of trust, and purchased by one of the beneficiaries under the deed for the benefit of himself or his firm, the unity of possession essential to the cotenancy was thereby dissolved, after which one of the original cotenants could purchase the land for his own benefit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Tobe McLawhorn and others against Wm. Harris and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs, children and heirs of Robert A. McLawhorn, deceased, bring this action against the feme defendant, Bettie Harris, only child and heir of L. Francis McLawhorn, deceased, to set up and establish a parol trust as against said Francis McLawhorn in the lands described in the pleadings, claiming to own one undivided half of the lands in common with the said Francis. His honor submitted these issues: "First. Did L. F. McLawhorn take title to said land from J. P. Elliott in trust, to hold one-half of the same for the benefit of plaintiffs? Answer: No. Second. At the time of the purchase of the land described in the complaint by L. F. McLawhorn, did he agree to take and hold said land as trustee for himself and the children of R. A. McLawhorn? Answer: No." The plaintiffs moved for a new trial. Motion overruled. The plaintiffs excepted and appealed from the judgment rendered.

Harry Skinner, for appellants. F. G. James & Son and L. I. Moore, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The land in controversy was conveyed to Robt. and Francis McLawhorn, brothers, in 1890, by Harry Skinner; the purchase price payable in cotton bonds. To secure the delivery of the cotton, certain bonds were taken, payable to the copartnership of Latham & Skinner, and secured by deed in trust to Harry Skinner. Before the death of Robert McLawhorn, which occurred in 1893, the cotton bonds were duly assigned by Latham & Skinner to Elliott Bros., of Baltimore. In default of the discharge of the bonds, the land was advertised and sold under the trust on March 24, 1894, by Harry Skinner, who conveyed it on said date to J. P. Elliott, of said firm. On May 28, 1894, J. P. Elliott conveyed the land to L. Francis McLawhorn, defendant Bettie's father, and took from him on same day a mortgage on the land securing the purchase price, to wit, 100 bales, 500 pounds each, merchantable lint cotton. This is the same price in cotton which the brothers, Robert A. and Francis McLawhorn, contracted to pay Latham & Skinner for the land.

There are nine assignments of error, all of which have received our consideration. None of them are of sufficient importance to justify an extended discussion, except the sixth.

[1] As one exception relates to a juror, we say that we do not think it is well that deputy sheriffs who summon jurors, mingle with, and have charge of, them, should serve as such during the terms of court when they are acting for the sheriff. In their discretion, the trial judges may well excuse them; but there is no statute, of which we are aware, which disqualifies them. But in this case Manning, the juror challenged, was not a deputy sheriff, but had been an officer in charge of another jury.

There were certain deeds and records introduced, over plaintiff's objection, which are excepted to as irrelevant and incompetent; but it is manifest that they did not bear upon the real issue, and, if erroneously received, the error was entirely harmless. If there is any error, it lies in the refusal of the court to charge the jury that if they believe the evidence in the case to answer the first issue, "Yea."

The plaintiffs rest their case upon two contentions, viz.: (a) That Francis McLawhorn purchased the land from J. P. Elliott in May, 1894, upon an express agreement that he would hold the land in trust for himself and the plaintiffs, his brother's children. This claim is embodied in the second issue. Under this issue, the plaintiffs attempted to establish an express trust; and it must be admitted that they introduced parol evidence which would have well warranted the jury in finding it for them. But the fact was controverted, and other evidence offered tending to deny the existence of any such agreement. The charge of the court upon this phase of the case presented the plaintiffs' contention with fullness and clearness, and was as favorable to them as they were entitled to. (b) The other contention is based upon two theories: First, that J. P. Elliott bought at his own sale, and consequently the sale was void; that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee continues to exist; and that, therefore, the tenancy in common between the plaintiffs and Francis McLawhorn has never been severed.

[2] We do not find anything in the record upon which to found such claim. The pleadings state that the sale was made by Skinner, the trustee in the deed, and the deed to Elliott executed by him and introduced by plaintiffs contains every essential recital, among others, that Skinner advertised the land according to the terms of the deed, and sold it to Elliott, the highest bidder. There is no evidence whatever which tends to controvert this, or to show that Elliott or his attorney made the sale, or controlled it. As the holder of the bonds secured in the deed, Elliott had a right to bid at the sale by the trustee. It was not his sale, but Skinner's, the person appointed by the mortgagors to make it, and in whom reposed the legal title. There is no evidence or even suggestion of any fraud, undue advantage, or oppression. So far as the record discloses, the sale was fair, open, and "above board," and made by the person vested with the power to sell.

[3] The second theory is that J. P. Elliott purchased the land, not for himself, but for Francis McLawhorn, and that, inasmuch as he could not legally acquire title to the land adverse to his cotenants at said sale, Elliott could not do so for him. The only evidence upon which to base this contention is that Elliott bought the land on March 24, 1894, and conveyed it to L. F. McLawhorn on the 28th of the following May, and the further fact that he sold it for 100 bales of cotton, the same price that the two brothers had agreed to pay Latham & Skinner for it. These may be suspicious circumstances, but it is manifest they do not warrant the charge asked for by plaintiffs. They are open to explanation, and different inferences may be drawn from them. They were properly submitted to the jury for what they were worth.

[4] Assuming that Elliott purchased the land for himself or his firm, to save his debt, we cannot agree with the learned counsel for plaintiff that Francis McLawhorn could not afterwards acquire title adverse to the plaintiffs, his former cotenants. We recognize the just principle that a cotenant, while such relation exists, may not acquire an outstanding title or lien upon the common property, and hold it for his own exclusive benefit. His cotenants may share it with him. Jackson v. Baird, 148 N. C. 29, 61 S. E. 632, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 591. But, nevertheless, a tenant in common as such is not a trustee for his cotenant. Saunders v. Gatlin, 21 N. C. 92. It is also true that where a cotenant in common acquires title from a sale under a deed of trust made by all the cotenants, for a debt binding all, and the sale is caused by his failure to pay his share of the debt, he cannot, under his rights so derived, hold the land against his cotenants. Read v. Bachman, 61 W. Va. 452, 57 S. E. 769, 123 Am. St. Rep. 996.

[5] But the jury has not accepted the theory that Elliott purchased for Francis McLawhorn; and there was very little evidence, so far as Elliott was concerned, to support that claim. Therefore, when the trustee conveyed all the land to Elliott, the unity of possession was destroyed, and the tenancy in common ended. Unity of possession is the only unity essential to such cotenancy; anything that operates to destroy this unity will dissolve the cotenancy in common. Sutton v. Jenkins, 147 N. C. 16, 60 S. E. 643; 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. 711. After the tenancy in common is actually dissolved, there is nothing in the law which forbids a former tenant in common from acquiring the entire property. He then has the same rights as any other individual. Sutton v. Jenkins, supra; Jackson v. Baird, 148 N. C. 29, 61 S. E. 632, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 591.

Upon a review of the record, we find no error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Ward, Judge.

Action by W. F. Morton and others against the Blades Lumber Company and others. From a judgment rendered after decision by the Supreme Court, defendant Mollie E. Morton appeals. Affirmed.

For former opinion, see 154 N. C. 337, 70 S. E. 623.

W. D. McIver, for appellant. Gulon & Gulon and Moore & Dunn, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. This case is reported in 154 N. C. 337, 70 S. E. 623. When our opinion was certified down, his honor, Judge Ferguson, rendered a final judgment, to which the defendant Mollie E. Morton excepted and from which she appealed.

We are of opinion that the judgment is strictly in accord with the opinion of this court; but we suggest that the court fix a time within which the timber described in the judgment be removed, which should not exceed probably 12 months from the beginning of the next civil term of the superior court of Craven county. Let the costs of this appeal be taxed against defendant Mollie E. Morton.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 584*)—WEIGHT—"PRIMA FACIE CASE."

A "prima facie case" is only evidence, stronger than ordinary proof, which the party against whom it is raised is not bound to overthrow by the greater weight of evidence, but which, if he fails to introduce proof to overcome it, will be sufficient to sustain an adverse verdict, though not conclusive.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—PHYSICAL CONDITION—DISEASE.

In an action on a life policy, evidence of nonexpert witnesses that they did not know whether insured had suffered from pneumonia prior to her application was not objectionable, as allowing nonexpert witnesses to testify that assured had never had pneumonia.

4. INSURANCE (§ 655*)—MISREPRESENTATION—EVIDENCE.

Where insurer pleaded misrepresentation as a defense to an action on a life policy, in that assured had falsely stated in her application that she had never had pneumonia or consumption, evidence of the medical examiner that he recommended the risk, not on her statement that she had never had pneumonia or consumption, but on his own examination and diagnosis of her physical condition, was admissible as some evidence that she had never suffered from pneumonia, consumption, or any other serious disease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Justice, Judge.

Action by James E. Brock against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Aycock & Winston and Geo. V. Cowper, for appellant. D. L. Ward, Loftin & Dawson, and McLean, Varser & McLean, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover the aggregate amount of two policies of insurance, one for $500 and the other for $154, which were issued, in July and September, 1908, by the defendant company on the life of Emma Davis, the daughter of the plaintiff. The case was tried upon issues to which there was no exception, and which, with the answers thereto, were as follows: "(1) Did the insured, Emma Davis, represent in her application for the policy for $500 that she had never had pneumonia? Answer: Yes. (2) Had Emma Davis had pneumonia prior to the filing of her application for the policy for $500? Answer: No. (3) Did the insured, Emma Davis, represent in her application for the policy for $500 that she had never had consumption? Answer: Yes. (4) Had the insured, Emma Davis, prior to said application, ever had consumption? Answer: No. (5) Did the insured, Emma Davis, in her application for the policy for $500, represent that she had not been under the care of any other physician within two years, for any serious illness, than Dr. Tull, for chills, May 19, 1908? Answer: Yes. (6) Was the insured under the care of any physician within two years, for any serious illness, other than Dr. Tull, for chills, May 19, 1908? Answer: No. (7) Did the insured, in her application for the policy for $154, represent that she had not been attended by a physician for any serious disease or complaint? Answer: Yes. (8) Had the insured, Emma Davis, prior to said application, been attended by any physician for any serious disease or complaint? Answer: No. (9) What amount, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover of defendant on said policies? Answer: $654, with interest from June 9, 1909." Judgment was given for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

[1] It appears that in the application for the policy the insured represented and stated that she had never had pneumonia or consumption; nor had she ever been treated by a physician for any serious illness. She was not able to pay the premium on the policy, or even to take out the policy, and her father did this for her, and after her death, as her next of kin and the beneficiary under the policy, he filed with the company a proof of loss, in which he stated that she had an attack of pneumonia, in February, 1906, prior to the date of her application, of about three weeks duration, and had chills and fevers occasionally all the time. There was evidence, we think, to show that this was a mistake, though it must be admitted that the state of the entire evidence was such as to justify the claim of the defendant's counsel that it preponderated in his favor. But we are not permitted to interfere with verdicts, by determining with whom the mere weight of the evidence lies. If there is any testimony fit for the jury to consider upon the issue made by the pleadings, we must abide by the verdict, and consider and decide only upon questions or inferences of law. The court charged the jury, substantially, with reference to the statement of the plaintiff in the proof of loss, or in what is called in the case his written claim for the insurance, that it was prima facie evidence of the fact that the deceased had pneumonia in 1906, and was otherwise ill, as stated, but that it devolved upon the plaintiff to satisfy them, upon all the evidence, that she did not have pneumonia prior to the date of her application. The defendant's counsel, in their able and learned brief, state that "it was around this point that the battle waged from the beginning to the end of the case." They requested the court to charge that there was not sufficient evidence to rebut this prima facie case made by the statement of the plaintiff in the application. Assuming, for the sake of discussion, that the judge laid down a correct rule of law, as to the force and effect of plaintiff's statement in the proof of loss, as to the deceased having had pneumonia—and we do not mean to question it in the least—we yet are of the opinion that there was evidence to rebut or overthrow the prima facie case thus raised. There was testimony, for example, which tended to show that the plaintiff was mistaken, and was speaking from hearsay, and not from his personal knowledge, when he made the statement, besides other competent and sufficient proof that the insured had not been a victim of pneumonia or consumption, or any other serious malady.

[2] The case, in this respect, was fairly submitted to the jury by Judge Justice, with his accustomed lucidity and accuracy in stating legal principles, as applied to the essential facts of a case; and, moreover, in this particular instance, the charge of his honor, if anything, placed the burden a shade too much upon the plaintiff; for where a prima facie case is established by the proof of a single fact, or a series or concatenation of facts (a chain of evidence, as we call it), it is, at last, as we will see has been said by the Supreme Court of the United States, only proof, though it may be strong, of the ultimate fact or facts to be shown, as necessary to the party's recovery or success. It is not conclusive, but must be submitted to the jury, either by itself or along with the other evidence, for them to find the ultimate, final, and constituent facts which, in law, are the true basis of recovery, whether by plaintiff or defendant. In other words, and to make this doctrine clearer, if possible, the prima facie case is only evidence, stronger, to be sure, than ordinary proof, and the party against whom it is raised by the law is not bound to overthrow it, and prove the contrary by the greater weight of evidence; but if he fails to introduce proof to overcome it he merely takes the chance of an adverse verdict, and this is practically the full force and effect given by the law to this prima facie case. He is entitled to go to the jury upon it and to combat it, as being insufficient proof of the ultimate fact under the circumstances of the case; but he takes the risk in so doing, instead of introducing evidence. We believe this is thoroughly in accord with our authorities.

In Shepard v. Telegraph Co., 143 N. C. 244, 55 S. E. 704, 118 Am. St. Rep. 796, the present Chief Justice, citing Board of Education v. Makely, 139 N. C. 35, 51 S. E. 786, and adopting as a correct statement of the law what is quoted in that case from 1 Elliott on Evidence, § 139 (not only a standard work, but one of the best we have on the law of evidence), said: "The burden of the issue—that is, the burden of proof—in the sense of ultimately proving or establishing the issue or case of the party upon whom such burden rests, as distinguished from the burden or duty of going forward and producing evidence, never shifts; but the burden or duty or proceeding or going forward often does shift from one party to the other, and sometimes back again. Thus, when the actor has gone forward and made a prima facie case, the other party is compelled in turn to go forward or lose his case, and in this sense the burden shifts to him. So the burden of going forward may, as to some particular matter, shift again to the first party in response to the call of a prima facie case or presumption in favor of the second party. But the party who has not the burden of the issue is not bound to disprove the actor's case by a preponderance of the evidence; for the actor must fail, if, upon the whole evidence, he does not have a preponderance, no matter whether it is because the weight of evidence is with the other party, or because the scales are equally balanced." The Chief Justice, in commenting upon this rule, stated the law of this state thus: "The burden of the issue as to negligence was apon the plaintiff. If no evidence had been offered in rebuttal, the court might have told the jury that if they believed the evidence to answer that issue, 'Yes.' But, when evidence was offered in rebuttal, it was not incumbent upon the defendant to prove it by a preponderance of testimony; but upon all the testimony it was the duty of the plaintiff to satisfy the jury by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence." This agrees with what was said in Womble v. Grocery Co., 135 N. C. 474, 47 S. E. 493, and Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 66, 50 S. E. 562, and Winslow v. Hardwood Co., 147 N. C. 277, 60 S. E. 1130, except in this: That the jury must be satisfied upon the prima facie case of the right to a verdict. So in this case the judge might well have submitted the prima facie case alone to the jury, if there had been no other evidence, for their consideration, and still he should have charged them that it is not conclusive, but they must say whether it is really according to the truth of the matter; or, to adopt the idea as expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States, a prima facie case is, at the most, merely sufficient proof to establish the fact, and if not rebutted it remains sufficient, but is not conclusive. In the recent case of Bailey v. State of Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. 191, the court says: "Prima facie evidence is sufficient evidence to outweigh the presumption of innocence, and, if not met by opposing evidence, to support a verdict of guilty. 'It is such as, in judgment of law, is sufficient to establish the fact, and, if not rebutted, remains sufficient for the purpose.'" But the court also held that prima facie evidence is at last only some evidence of the main facts, sufficient, it is true, to support a verdict, but not absolutely controlling upon the jury, who may convict or not upon it, as they may see fit, or who, in a civil case, may find a verdict in accordance with it, or, by disregarding it as being insufficient to convince them, may return the opposite verdict. And so, in Bailey v. State, 161 Ala. at page 78, 49 South. at page 887 (same case), the court says: "It must be borne in mind that the rule of evidence fixed by the statute does not make it the duty of the jury to convict on the evidence referred to in the enactment, if unrebutted, whether satisfied thereby of the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt or not. On the contrary, with such evidence before them, the jury are still left free to find the accused guilty or not guilty, according as they may be satisfied of his guilt, or not, by the whole evidence."

[3] It was objected and argued by defendant's counsel that the court had permitted nonexpert witnesses for the plaintiff to testify that the deceased had never had pneumonia; but we do not think their negative testimony can bear this construction. They merely said, as we understand them, that they did not know whether or not she had suffered from this disease. They did not profess to say, or to give a medical opinion, upon facts known to them or otherwise, as to whether she had pneumonia. A fair interpretation of what they said would lead us to the inference that they simply had not heard of any such thing.

[4] The testimony of Dr. Pollock, the medical examiner of the company, that he recommended the risk, not upon her statement that she had never had pneumonia or consumption, but upon his own examination and diagnosis of her physical condition, was clearly competent. Of course, as contended by defendant's counsel, the question was, not whether the medical examiner was influenced in giving his certificate of her physical soundness by any statement she had made, but rather whether the defendant was induced thereby to issue the policy, or to enter into the contract of insurance with her; and his testimony was competent and relevant in this view to rebut the allegation that she had ever actually been afflicted with the diseases mentioned, for he stated, also, that she had not been so affected, and the very fact that he examined and "passed her," in view of the questions asked in the application, was some evidence, under all the circumstances of this case, that she had never suffered from pneumonia or consumption, or any other serious disease. We have found no error in the trial.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Martin County; Geo. W. Ward, Judge.

Action by W. L. Sherrod, surviving partner of J. W. Sherrod & Bro., against N. J. Mayo, administrator of J. W. Sherrod, deceased, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, granting insufficient relief, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

This is a civil action, brought by the plaintiff as surviving partner, against the administrator and the heir at law and son of John W. Sherrod, for a settlement of the copartnership estate, which consisted of a large number of tracts of land and a large quantity of personal property, used principally in farming operations. The plaintiff asked to be put in possession of all the lands and personal property belonging to the copartnership, some of which was in the possession of defendants, claiming the right to sell both lands and personal property as surviving partner, for the purpose of settling up the partnership. It is admitted that there are no copartnership debts outstanding due third parties. The cause was heard upon the pleadings and affidavits.

Upon the pleadings, affidavits, and admitted facts, plaintiff asked (1) that the plaintiff be decreed entitled to the possession of the entire partnership property, both real and personal; (2) that the defendants be restrained from interfering in any way with the plaintiff in custody, control, or management of the partnership property; (3) if the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree adjudging him the owner and entitled to the entire property of the partnership, for the purpose of winding up and settling the same, then that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the entire partnership property, and wind up and settle the partnership affairs under the order of this court; (4) for reference and statement of account between the parties.

His honor ordered a reference to state the copartnership account since the last settlement, admitted to have been made between the partners in 1904; decreed that plaintiff, as surviving partner, is entitled to possession of the personal property, for the purpose of selling it and administering the same; and the court further decreed: "The motion of the plaintiff that he be placed in possession of that part of the real estate, which is above described as being in Edgecombe and Nash counties, as surviving partner, is denied."

The facts with respect to the real estate, are not in dispute, and are as follows: "(1) The lands described in the complaint, however conveyed in the deeds, were bought by J. P. W. Sherrod & Bro. with partnership funds. (2) It is also not in dispute, but is really admitted, and the court so finds, that there is sufficient personal property on hand, when sold and the proceeds collected, to pay every debt owing by J. W. Sherrod & Bro., including the debt owing each member of the firm by the firm. The court further finds that the only debts there are owing by the firm of J. W. Sherrod & Bro. are the debts owing to the members of said firm. (3) That on the 12th day of September, 1904, J. W. Sherrod, deceased partner of J. W. Sherrod & Bro., executed and delivered deed for all of his rights, title, and interest in the farms in Edgecombe county, known as Pittman place, Cutchin place, Pippen place, and Watkins place, and all his interest in the personal property on each of said farms, to defendant John M. Sherrod. That said deed was registered in Edgecomb county on the ——— day of April, 1910. That the plaintiff in this cause had no knowledge or information as to the execution or delivery of said deed until after the institution of this suit, and shortly prior to the April term, 1911, of Edgecombe court. (4) It thus being a fact that it will take none of the real estate, under any circumstances, to settle any of the indebtedness or expenses incurred in winding up the estate, but that it would go entirely to the partners and their heirs, as tenants in common, the court is of opinion that it ought not to go into the hands of the surviving partner as such, and that he is not entitled to the possession of same as such surviving partner, nor ought he to be permitted to sell the real estate as such surviving partner for partition, but that the said surviving partner and heirs at law of the deceased partner are tenants in common, and either has a right to insist upon partition of the land in kind. Whereupon it is ordered that the motion of the plaintiff that he be put in possession of said lands as surviving partner is denied."

To so much of the order as denied the right of the plaintiff to take possession and sell all the real estate of the copartnership, the plaintiff excepts and appeals.

W. J. Sherrod, G. H. A. Gilliam, and Justice & Broadhurst, for plaintiff. G. M. T. Fountain & Son and Bunn & Spruill, for defendants.

BROWN, J. It is the doctrine of the English courts that, as between partners and their heirs and representatives, for the purposes of the copartnership, real estate will be treated as personalty, if the partners have by the articles of copartnership so treated it and impressed upon it the character of personalty.

[1] There is no doubt that in this country, copartners may, by articles of copartnership, provide that the firm's real estate may be treated as personalty, and sold by the surviving partner for the settlement of the copartnership.

[2] In the absence of any such stipulation, it was a vexed question for a long time whether, after the dissolution of the firm by the death of one of the members, the debts being paid, the share of the deceased partner should be treated as personalty, and pass to the surviving partner for the settlement of the copartnership, or descend to his heirs at law as real estate.

Judge Story refers to the great diversity of juridical opinion upon this subject. The question was considered by this court in Summey v. Patton, 60 N. C. 601, 86 Am. Dec. 451, and it was then decided that, "where land is purchased by partnership, with partnership funds, and used for partnership purposes, upon dissolution of the firm by the death of one of the partners, his share of the land descends to his heir at law as real estate, and does not pass to his representative as personalty, in the absence of any agreement in the articles of copartnership." This case was approved and followed in Stroud v. Stroud, 61 N. C. 525, where it is held that real estate belonging to a copartnership is subject to dower of the widow of a deceased partner, subject, of course, to the payment of the partnership debts, in the absence of any provision to the contrary in the articles of copartnership. Patton v. Patton, 60 N. C. 572, 86 Am. Dec. 448. These cases are all cited and approved in Mendenhall v. Benbow, 84 N. C. 650. These decisions have settled the question in this state, and they are in accord with the great weight of authority in this country.

In the case of Shearer v. Shearer, 98 Mass. 107, the subject is elaborately discussed, and what is regarded as the American rule is embodied in the opinion, the substance of which is that the change of character of real to personal estate is worked, if at all, only for the purpose of adjusting and settling the affairs of the partnership, and when the debts are paid the interest of the deceased partner will descend to his heirs.

The following authorities support the decisions of this court: George on Partnership, pp. 126, 127; Story on Partnership, § 92, p. 146; Way v. Stebbins, 47 Mich. 297, 11 N. W. 166; in which it is said: "Partnership lands are to be equally divided among survivors and the heirs of a deceased partner, when there are no partnership debts to be satisfied." Foster's Appeal, 74 Pa. 392, 15 Am. Rep. 553; Yeatman v. Woods, 6 Yerg. (Tenn.) 20, 27 Am. Dec. 452, and note 454; notes to 86 Am. Dec. 454.

So it has been held that upon the dissolution of a firm real estate may be divided by compulsory partition, when it is shown that it is not required to satisfy the liability of the partnership. Pepper v. Pepper, 24 Ill. App. 316; Strong v. Lord, 107 Ill. 25; Lang v. Waring, 25 Ala. 625, 60 Am. Dec. 533; Shearer v. Shearer, 98 Mass. 107; Scruggs v. Blair, 44 Miss. 406; note to 27 L. R. A. 353.

[3] The fact that the son and heir of the deceased partner claims his father's interest in a portion of the lands by deed, instead of inheritance, makes no difference. He is entitled to the deceased partner's share of the land after the debts are paid, whether he takes by purchase or by descent. Wells v. Mitchell, 23 N. C. 489, 35 Am. Dec. 757.

The judgment is affirmed.

Defendant's Appeal.

[4] The defendants excepted to so much of the judgment of the superior court as required the surrender by them to plaintiff as surviving partner, of the personal property in their possession belonging to the copartnership. It is well settled that the surviving copartner has the closing up of the partnership affairs, the reduction of its personal property to cash, and the settlement of the partnership affairs. George on Partnership, page 135. The reasons which in this country are regarded as sufficient to forbid the sale of real estate, except when necessary to pay the debts of the copartnership, or for its proper settlement, do not apply to personalty. The title to that vests at once in the survivor, and not in the personal representative of the deceased partner, and he is entitled to its possession. Revisal, § 1579; Walker v. Miller, 139 N. C. 448, 52 S. E. 125, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 157, 111 Am. St. Rep. 805; Weisel v. Cobb, 114 N. C. 22, 18 S. E. 943; Hodgin v. Bank, 128 N. C. 110, 38 S. E. 294.

[5] Purchasers of the share of an individual partner can only take his interest. That interest, and not a share of the partnership personal effects, is sold, and it consists of the vendor's share of the surplus which remains after payment of the partnership debts and the settlement of accounts between the partners; and if, upon the winding up of the firm, the transferring partner's interest has no pecuniary value, the transferee takes nothing by his transfer. Cyc., vol. 30, p. 458; Daniel v. Crowell, 125 N. C. 519, 34 S. E. 684; Ross v. Henderson, 77 N. C. 170.

The judgment is affirmed.

MORSE & RODGERS, Inc., v. SCHULTZ.

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 232*)—MARRIED WOMAN CONDUCTING BUSINESS IN OWN NAME—LIABILITY OF HUSBAND—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A seller shipping goods to a married woman conducting business in her own name, and displaying at her place of business a sign in conformity with Revisal 1905, § 2118, has the burden of proving, to hold the husband liable, that he, by false representations relied on by the seller, had imposed on the seller or his agent as being the buyer, and that he, and not his wife, was the real debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING TESTIMONY.

Where, in an action against a husband for goods sold to his wife, conducting business in her own name, in conformity with Revisal 1905, § 2118, the agent effecting the sale testified that he dealt with the husband, who was in sole control of the store, and negotiated the trade, and believed that he was the proprietor of the business, that after the sale he advised the seller not to ship the goods, but that the seller shipped them, and the husband testified that more than five months before the order was taken he had personally informed the seller that he was only a buyer for his wife, to whom the goods were billed and shipped, a charge that, unless the husband at the time of the purchase told the agent of his agency for his wife, or unless the agent ascertained the fact, the husband was personally liable was objectionable, as ignoring the husband's testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Ward, Judge.

Action by Morse & Rodgers, Incorporated, against Louis Schultz. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Civil action to recover $341, with interest from October 4, 1909, as the contract price of goods sold and delivered. The jury rendered verdict as follows: "Is defendant indebted to plaintiff as alleged in the complaint, and, if so, in what amount? Answer: Yes; $341, with interest from October 4, 1909." Judgment on the verdict, and defendant excepted and appealed.

T. T. Thorne, for appellant. E. B. Grantham, for appellee.

HOKE, J. On the trial and after the jury was impaneled, admissions were made as follows: "It was admitted, for the purposes of the trial, that on September 4, 1909, the time when the goods were sold for the purchase price for which the suit was brought, that the goods were billed out to and shipped to M. Schultz, the wife of the defendant, who at that time was conducting business in her own name, and who had conspicuously displayed at her place of business a sign in conformity with section 2118, Revisal 1905. It was further admitted that the goods shipped and amounting to $341.50 had not been paid for." Evidence was then offered, on the part of plaintiff, tending to show that in April, 1909, at Rocky Mount, N. C., the place of business of M. Schultz, plaintiff sold the goods to defendant, for delivery in September following. That the sale was made, and credit given to defendant, personally, under the impression that defendant himself was the M. Schultz to whom the goods were afterwards shipped, and that this impression was caused by representations of the defendant, as inducements to the trade, reasonably relied upon by plaintiff company. C. C. Alcorn, a witness for plaintiff, testified that he was the agent who effected the sale. That he dealt with defendant and sold the goods under the impression that he was the proprietor of the business, and that his name was M. Schultz. That he did not observe the sign referred to in the admission, but defendant alone was there, in apparent charge and control of the store, and negotiated the trade. That plaintiff thought defendant's name was Max, called him Max, and billed the goods to Max, but stated further that defendant rubbed the name out and substituted M. Schultz. This witness further stated that he knew defendant's wife was named Mamie. The deposition of Arthur Pattison, vice president and one of the managers of plaintiff company, was then offered in evidence, in which it was stated, among other things, that in November, 1908, defendant was in plaintiff's place of business in New York, and represented that he was named M. Schultz, and the proprietor of this business, and bought a bill of goods in that name, which were paid for, and that the present bill was sold under the impression so caused that the sale was being made to defendant, etc. Defendant, a witness in his own behalf, denied that he had represented himself to be M. Schultz, said that the salesman, Alcorn, knew that defendant's name was Louis, and was fully aware of the fact that the business belonged to his wife, and was conducted in her name of M. Schultz. He denied further that he had represented himself, in New York, to be M. Schultz, the proprietor of the business, but that he had then told plaintiff's officers that he was only a buyer for the firm. On this and other relevant testimony, the court charged the jury: "That unless the defendant, at the time of making the bill for which the suit was brought, told the witness, Alcorn, that he was the agent of M. Schultz, or unless the witness ascertained such fact from the sign displayed in accordance with section 2118 of the Revisal, at M. Schultz's place of business, or by some other reasonable means such fact was made known to Alcorn at or before the time of making the sale, then the defendant would be personally liable for the plaintiff's account, and the jury should so answer the issue;" and we are of opinion that this was not a correct rule to guide the jury in their determination of the issue.

[1, 2] The plaintiff, at the beginning of the trial, had admitted that the goods had been billed out and shipped to M. Schultz, the wife of defendant, who was there conducting the business in her own name, and in the presence of this admission, and on general principles, if plaintiff sought to charge defendant personally, whose name was Louis Schultz, the burden was on the company to show that the present defendant, by false representations, reasonably relied upon by them, had imposed himself upon the company or its agent as being M. Schultz, and that he, and not M. Schultz, was the real debtor; and the charge in question, duly excepted to, erroneously places on defendant the burden of exculpating himself, thereby assuming that essential portions of plaintiff's evidence should be accepted as true; and is further objectionable in restricting the jury to what took place between the defendant and the salesman, Alcorn, thereby ignoring the testimony of defendant to the effect that, on the November previous, not more than five months before this order was taken, he had personally informed the owners and managers of plaintiff company that he was only a buyer for M. Schultz, to whom the goods were billed and shipped. This objection is emphasized by the fact that the witness, Alcorn, in his testimony, further stated that after negotiating the sale, when he went back to New York, he advised the house not to ship the goods, showing that, in completing the sale, the management acted to some extent on their own knowledge of conditions, and were not influenced altogether by the account this witness may have given them. There is error which entitles defendant to have the cause tried before another jury, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Cooke, Judge.

Proceedings for the removal of W. H. Hudson as administrator of Martha Saville, deceased, and the appointment of Haley Perry in his stead. From a judgment affirming the judgment of the clerk refusing to remove the administrator, the parties aggrieved appeal. Affirmed.

N. Y. Gulley, for appellant. B. T. Holden, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. Martha Saville died intestate July 11, 1911, leaving her surviving two brothers and two sisters as her next of kin. On July 18, 1911, the younger brother applied in writing to the clerk to appoint some one administrator. On the next day the elder brother filed his renunciation with the clerk, and asked that W. H. Hudson be appointed administrator, which was done. On July 26th the younger brother asked that Hudson be removed, on the ground that his appointment was illegal. Hudson was cited to appear before the clerk on August 11, 1911, to answer the motion for removal. On August 2d the younger brother and the two sisters had filed their renunciation, and asked that one Perry be appointed administrator. At the hearing no evidence was offered to show why Hudson should be removed; the motion being entirely based upon the above facts.

[1] Revisal, § 3 (2), provides that, when there is no husband or widow, the clerk shall appoint the next of kin according to their degree, and, if of equal degree, shall appoint one or more of them at his discretion. It was competent, therefore, for the clerk to have appointed the elder brother. All four of the brothers and sisters having renounced, it was equally in the discretion of the clerk to appoint the person recommended by the elder brother, instead of the nominee of the others.

[2] Certainly the younger brother and the two sisters having renounced could not demand the removal of the administrator who had been appointed by the clerk at a time when Hudson was the only person recommended, and when the younger brother had asked the appointment of an administrator without naming any one. There being no cause shown for the removal of Hudson, the clerk was within his powers in refusing to do so.

[3] Even if Hudson had been set aside and the appointment had come up de novo, Hudson, being recommended by one of the next of kin, was fully as eligible as Perry, who had been recommended by the others. Upon such state of facts, it would be in the discretion of the clerk to choose between them.

[4] All four of the next of kin renounced. But, if they had not done so, it would have been proper for the clerk to refuse to appoint either one of them, as they were all unable to read and write. Stephenson v. Stephenson, 49 N. C. 472. His honor properly affirmed the judgment of the clerk in refusing to remove the administrator.

Affirmed.

Charles F. Dunn, in pro. per.

WALKER, J. This action was brought under Revisal 1905, §§ 2001-2011, and is a summary proceeding in ejectment by the plaintiff, as landlord, against the defendant, as his tenant. It appears from the testimony of the plaintiff, the only witness examined, that he leased the land to the defendant in May, 1909, at 50 cents a week, and that the rent was regularly paid until November of that year, when the defendant, upon demand, refused either to pay rent or to quit the premises. The plaintiff thereupon brought this proceeding against him before a justice of the peace, who, after hearing the case, gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $5.25 and costs. The defendant appealed, and gave bond to stay the execution, conditioned that "he would pay any judgment which in this or any other action the plaintiff may recover for rent of the said premises and damages for the detention thereof," which condition is in accordance with the statute in such cases made and provided. Revisal, § 2008. W. C. Fields is surety on the bond. The case was tried in the superior court upon two issues: "(1) Are the plaintiffs entitled to the possession of the property described in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (2) What amount, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled to recover of the defendants? Answer: $5.25." The court instructed the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they should answer the first issue, "Yes," and the second issue, "$5.25" (the amount of rents to the time of the justice's trial), which was accordingly done, and from the judgment upon the verdict the plaintiff appealed, being content with the charge as to the first issue, but alleging error as to the second.

We gather from the record, which is not made up in a regular and orderly way, though sufficiently so for our decision upon the merits of the case, that the defendant did not enter his appeal to the justice's judgment within the time prescribed by the statute (Revisal, §§ 1491 and 2008); but in the view we take of the case this is not a material or practical question. We are unable to determine upon what ground or for what reason the court denied the plaintiff's right to an assessment of the rents and damages accrued to the date of the trial. Revisal, § 2006, expressly provides for such an assessment in this kind of proceeding, and directs that the verdict shall include, and the judgment shall be entered for, such rents and damages, and this is in addition the general rule, regardless of any special statutory provision. This court said, in Morisey v. Swinson, 104 N. C. 555, 10 S. E. 754, that "under the present method of procedure rents are recoverable up to the time of the trial," and this is allowed in order to avoid circuity of action, or multiplicity of suits, and so that the entire controversy, as far as it may be done, will be settled in one action; this being in accordance with the very spirit and purpose of our Code. See, also, Whisenhunt v. Jones, 78 N. C. 361; Burnett v. Nicholson, 86 N. C. 99; Grant v. Edwards, 88 N. C. 246. The plaintiff duly excepted to the erroneous instruction upon the measure of damages, and his exception must be sustained, and the case remanded for a new trial upon the second issue alone. In other respects the verdict will stand until it is completed by a correct finding upon that issue. The judgment upon the verdict will be entered, both against the defendant and his surety, for the amount assessed. Revisal, § 2006.

New trial.

STATE v. COLE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 4, 1911.)

1. ELECTIONS (§ 120*)—PRIMARY ELECTION LAW—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Laws 1909, c. 749, providing for and regulating the holding of primary elections in W. county, is constitutional.

2. ELECTIONS (§ 328*)—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

Where an indictment against a primary election manager accused him in a plain and explicit manner of refusing to count ballots legally deposited in the box, an exception that it did not charge any offense within Laws 1909, c. 749, nor Revisal 1905, § 3576, regulating primary elections, nor the common law, was unsustainable.

3. ELECTIONS (§ 310*)—"PUBLIC ELECTION"—OFFENSES.

A primary election for nomination of county officers is a "public election," and any conduct on the part of the managers thereof which interferes with the freedom or purity thereof is punishable at common law.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5787.]

4. ELECTIONS (§ 328*)—PRIMARY ELECTION—OFFENSES—FRAUD—INDICTMENT.

Where an indictment for violating the primary election law alleged that defendant was manager of the election, and that he refused to count certain ballots deposited for a certain candidate, his duties under the statute made him an officer, and it was not necessary to charge that he was a state or county officer, or to allege that the duties it was claimed he did not properly perform devolved on him by virtue of his office, or that he took an oath.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 328.*]

5. ELECTIONS (§ 126*)—PRIMARY ELECTION—MANAGER—DUTY TO COUNT BALLOTS.

Where ballots voted at a primary election have passed the challenger and been cast, one of the managers of the election has no right to refuse to call and count them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 126.*]

6. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 132*)—COUNTS—JOINDER.

An indictment against a primary election manager, in two counts, one alleging that he did unlawfully, etc., count and call but 14 votes for T., a candidate for county treasurer, when, in fact, 20 votes were duly and lawfully cast for T., and another charging a like failure to call and count votes cast at the same primary for A. for the same office, was not objectionable as multifarious, the two counts pertaining to defendant's conduct at the same time and place with reference to the counting of votes for the same office, and it was proper to refuse to require an election.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 425-453; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 429*)—EVIDENCE—RECORDS—PROOF.

In a prosecution of a manager of a primary election for failure to call and count ballots, the secretary of the county board of elections and deputy register of deeds was permitted to testify that a paper purporting to be the return of the primary election of the township in question, signed by defendant as one of the managers, was filed and recorded in the office of the register of deeds. Held, that such paper, being shown to have been merely filed and recorded and not probated, and its filing and registration not being required by a statute, did not prove itself, and was improperly admitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Warren County; Jos. S. Adams, Judge.

W. J. Cole was convicted of violating a primary election law, and he appeals. Reversed.

B. B. Williams, T. T. Hicks, and Thos. M. Pittman, for appellant. T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., Geo. L. Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., and J. C. Little, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant was a manager of a primary election held in Smith Creek township, Warren county, August 9, 1910, under the provisions of chapter 749, Laws 1909, "to provide for and regulate the holding of primary elections in Warren county." He is indicted upon two counts in one bill: (1) That he "did unlawfully, willfully, and fraudulently count and call but 14 votes for W. S. Terrell, * * * a candidate for the office of treasurer of said Warren county, when in fact and truth 20 votes were duly and lawfully cast for said W. S. Terrell"; and (2) a like charge in respect of fraudulently not calling and counting votes cast at such primary for M. B. Alston for the office of treasurer. From a verdict of guilty and judgment thereon the defendant appeals to this court (1) for errors committed upon the trial; (2) because the statute providing for such primary election is unconstitutional and void.

The indictment was under section 3576 of the Revisal of 1905 and the common law. If the act is unconstitutional, it would be unnecessary to consider the other exceptions, but we take it that it is scarcely necessary to discuss the proposition.

[1] The primary system has been so long and so generally recognized that it has become an essential part of our political system. "In the early days of the republic the nominating system, as now known, did not exist," says Merriam on Primary Elections. "Candidates for local office were presented to the electorate upon their own announcement, upon the indorsement of a mass meeting or upon nomination by informal caucuses, while aspirants for state office were generally named by a 'legislative caucus' composed of members of the party in the Legislature." Candidates for President were named by the congressional caucus. After a long struggle the legislative caucus and the congressional caucus were overthrown largely by the influence of Andrew Jackson, under whose leadership the nominating convention system was adopted. The evils which have grown up under the latter system are too well known to be discussed. The primary system was inaugurated as a relief from those evils. The first primary law was enacted in California in March, 1866 (St. 1865-66, p. 438), and was closely followed by the New York act in April of the same year (Laws 1866, c. 783). In 1871 Ohio (68 Ohio Laws, p. 27) and Pennsylvania (P. L. 1871, p. 1000) followed their lead, and in 1875 a similar law was passed in Missouri. (Laws 1875, p. 54.) From that time on the primary system has spread to all parts of the country, and various changes and modifications have been adopted from time to time to cure the evils therein which became apparent.

In this state the first primary laws were enacted in 1901, the first act (chapter 524) applying to Mecklenburg county. Chapter 752 in the same year provided the primary system for the counties of Anson, Cabarrus, Dare, Durham, Forsyth, Granville, Haywood, Henderson, Johnston, Northampton, Orange, Pamlico, Richmond, Tyrrell, Wake, and Washington. In 1903 chapter 123 provided primaries for Richmond county, and chapter 793 for Henderson county. In Laws 1906, primaries were provided (chapters 795, 837) for New Hanover county and city of Wilmington.

In 1907 primaries were provided: Chapter 116, for Union and Onslow counties; chapter 190, for Rowan and Camden counties; chapter 247, for Buncombe county and Ashville township; chapter 374, for Robeson county; chapter 399, for Scotland county; chapter 405, for Guilford county and city of Greensboro; chapter 761, for Columbus county; chapter 926, for the counties of Anson, Beaufort, Bladen, Columbus, Davidson, Durham, Halifax, Lenoir, Madison, Martin, Nash, Onslow, and Wake. In 1908 (Special Session) chapter 57 provided for a primary election in New Hanover county. In 1909 statutes in regard to primaries were enacted: Chapter 494, for Halifax and Nash counties; chapter 771, for Hertford county; chapter 850, for Union county; chapter 876, for Cumberland county; chapter 883, for Scotland county. In 1911, primaries were enacted: Pub. Local Laws, c. 309, for Wilson county; chapter 342, for Warren county; chapter 412, for Nash county; chapter 572, for Richmond county; chapter 620, for Wake county and the city of Raleigh; chapter 624, for the counties of Currituck, Camden, and Chowan; chapter 633, for Beaufort county; chapter 635, for Wayne county; chapter 719, for Johnston county; chapter 749, for Cumberland county; chapter 764, for the counties of Bladen, Dare, Gaston, Greene, Northampton, and Pamlico. Several of the above acts were amendments to correct defects which by experience had been found in prior acts. There may be other primary acts, but those cited are sufficient to show that the primary system and its regulation by law has become an integral part of our political system in North Carolina as well as elsewhere.

While the primary system has not heretofore been before this court, it has been discussed in numerous decisions in other states, and the constitutionality of statutes regulating primary elections has been fully recognized. Among such cases are Spier v. Baker, 120 Cal. 370, 52 Pac. 659, 41 L. R. A. 196; Britton v. Com'rs, 129 Cal. 337, 61 Pac. 1115, 51 L. R. A. 115; McCarthy v. Moore, 87 Minn. 308, 92 N. W. 4, 59 L. R. A. 447, 94 Am. St. Rep. 702, and cases cited in the notes thereto; Breckon v. Com'rs, 221 Ill. 9, 77 N. E. 321, 5 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 562. In the notes to the last case the citations are numerous, giving adjudications upon almost every feature of the primary system. The constitutionality of a subject which has been so fully, so long, and so widely recognized by the courts and by legislation cannot be seriously discussed.

[2] As to the exceptions for alleged errors during the trial: Exception 1, for refusal to quash the bill, was properly denied. The indictment expressed the charge against the defendant in a "plain, intelligible and explicit manner." The grounds urged for quashing savored "of informalities or refinements" for which no bill can be quashed. Revisal, § 3254. The defendant moved to quash the bill because (1) the bill of indictment does not charge any offense within the terms of Act 1909, c. 749, nor of section 3576, Revisal, nor at common law; (2) that it does not allege that the defendant was a state or county officer; (3) that it does not allege that the acts and omissions complained of devolved upon him by virtue of his office; (4) that it does not allege by what authority he was made pollholder and manager for the alleged primary; (5) that it does not allege for what, if any, political party such primary was held; (7) that it does not allege that defendant failed or refused to count the votes of any bona fide member of the political party for which such primary was held, nor that he was a qualified elector and had taken the prescribed oath that he was a resident of the precinct, was a duly qualified elector, and had not voted before in said primary election; (8) that it is not alleged that the persons for whom such votes were cast and not counted were qualified candidates, entitled to receive votes in such primary for nomination to the office of treasurer of Warren county.

[3] This primary election was a public election, and any conduct which interferes with the freedom or purity of the election is punishable at common law. Bishop, Cr. Law, § 471; State v. Jackson, 73 Me. 91, 40 Am. Rep. 342; Commonwealth v. Silsbee, 9 Mass. 417; Commonwealth v. McHale, 97 Pa. 397, 39 Am. Rep. 808.

[4] As to the other exceptions, it is not necessary to charge that the defendant was a state or county officer. The bill alleges that he was manager of the election, and his duties under the statute make him an officer. It was unnecessary to allege that those duties devolved upon him by virtue of his office, or that he took an oath. State v. Wynne, 118 N. C. 1206, 24 S. E. 216; State v. Powers, 75 N. C. 281. It is sufficiently charged that it was a Democratic primary election.

[5] It is unnecessary to discuss the qualification of the electors whose votes the defendant failed to count. These votes had been cast. They had passed the challenger, and, when the defendant reached these ballots in the box, it was his plain duty to call and count them. He had no right to rule out the votes if he believed they were invalid, and it is not pretended that he did so.

[6] The two counts in the bill of indictment pertained to the conduct of the defendant at the same time and place and of the same nature and in the same matter of counting votes for the same office. The joinder was proper, and did not make the bill multifarious, and it was not error to refuse to require the solicitor to elect. It is not unusual in an indictment for larceny to lay the property in one count in A. and in another count in B., or to join counts for an assault upon different persons when parts of the same act.

[7] The only exception which has given us any difficulty is the second exception. The secretary of the county board of elections and deputy register of deeds was permitted to testify that a paper purporting to be the return of the primary election of Smith Creek township held August 9, 1910, signed by H. F. Hooker and W. J. Cole (defendant), managers, was filed and recorded in the office of the register of deeds. This return was not proven at the trial, and its filing and registration, not being required by the statute, could add nothing to its validity, and could not be proof of its execution, particularly as it had not been probated, but was merely shown to be on file and recorded.

It was error therefore to receive it, for which error there must be a new trial.

FARMER v. SELLERS.

1. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§§ 10, 11*)—BOND—NECESSITY.

A constable appointed by the Governor under Dispensary Act Feb. 16, 1907 (25 St. at Large, p. 463), is not required to give bond, and, when acting under a commission from the Governor without having given bond, is a de facto officer, even if a bond were required.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 251*)—EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

The Supreme Court will not decide on appeal in an action for the wrongful killing of plaintiff's husband while entering defendant's house as constable whether decedent's appointment by the Governor gave him authority as dispensary constable without a formal commission, where that question was not made by the exceptions.

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 249*)—SEARCHES.

Under Dispensary Act Feb. 16, 1907 (25 St. at Large, p. 472) § 22, providing that a search warrant shall empower any officer or person who may be deputized to make the search, an officer appointed for the purpose of enforcing the dispensary law was authorized to execute a search warrant in the course of his duties without a special appointment therefor by the magistrate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 136*)—JURY QUESTIONS—DELAY.

It is the province of the jury to determine what is reasonable promptness in discharging any legal or contractual duty, unless but one conclusion can be drawn from the evidence.

5. SEARCHES AND SEIZURES (§ 3*)—WARRANT—ENFORCEMENT.

A search warrant cannot be legally enforced so long after its issuance that the search could not be reasonably considered a bona fide effort to recover the property described, though there is no absolute time fixed by law for enforcing the warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Searches and Seizures, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 3; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

6. SEARCHES AND SEIZURES (§ 3*)—ENFORCEMENT OF WARRANT—TIME.

The time of executing a search warrant depends upon the character of the person charged with having the stolen or contraband goods, the nature of the crime charged, etc.; there being no absolute time fixed by law for its execution.

7. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 249*)—SEARCH WARRANT—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—SUFFICIENCY.

A search warrant describing the property to be seized as the "following contraband intoxicating liquors now unlawfully in the possession, storage, and keeping of and on the premises occupied by S., the said place being known as No. 1216 G. street in the city of C., to wit, a lot of whisky, brandy, wine, rum, gin, and beer in barrels, demijohns, bottles, and other vessels," sufficiently described the premises and property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 376-385; Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

8. SEARCHES AND SEIZURES (§ 3*)—SEARCH WARRANT.

It is immaterial in an action for damages for a constable's death while executing a search warrant on defendant's premises that the affidavit described the premises as a certain street number, while the warrant directed the officer to enter the building at that address "or other place appurtenant thereto," where the killing occurred at that address which decedent undertook to enter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Searches and Seizures, Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

9. SEARCHES AND SEIZURES (§ 3*)—SEARCH WARRANT.

It is immaterial in an action for damages for the killing of plaintiff's husband while executing a search warrant that the warrant directed the search to be made "by day or by night," when the statute forbids searching a dwelling at night; the search having been actually prosecuted in the daytime.

10. DEATH (§ 60*)—ACTIONS—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for damages for the killing of plaintiff's husband by defendant, evidence that plaintiff was the prosecuting witness on defendant's trial for murder was not admissible, not being necessary to show plaintiff's feelings against defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

11. TRIAL (§ 296*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for damages for killing plaintiff's husband while he was executing a search warrant at defendant's dwelling, the court charged that a person's dwelling was his castle, which he had a right to protect from unlawful invasion, and that he could use such force as was necessary to protect an invasion of his home, opposing force with force, and, "if a person invades your home, you have the right to eject him. Your duty in the first instance is to go and lay your hand on him gently, and, if he resists you, then you have the right to oppose sufficient force to overcome his resistance." The court also instructed that, if decedent was in defendant's house without authority, defendant could oppose him by force to the extent of taking his life if necessary. Held, that the quoted part was not prejudicial error for requiring a house owner under all circumstances to lay his hands gently on an intruder; the question for the jury's decision being whether defendant was justified in shooting decedent while he was forcing his way into defendant's house in order to prevent entry or injury to defendant.

12. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGES ON FACTS.

In an action for damages for the death of plaintiff's husband while executing a search warrant at defendant's house, defendant requested the court to charge that if decedent had threatened defendant's life, and defendant honestly believed that decedent intended to carry out the threat by taking his life, etc., and the jury, viewing the circumstances from the standpoint of the defendant at the time of the fatal encounter, conclude as reasonable men that he was justified in the belief, then defendant was entitled to be more watchful, and to interpret decedent's acts more harshly than he would otherwise have done. Held, that the requested charge was properly refused, as instructing what force the jury should give to evidence of threats.

13. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1067*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL.

The proposition submitted by the requested instruction was so obvious that to omit it could not have affected the verdict.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by May W. Farmer against Wade H. Sellers. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nelson, Nelson & Gettys and Frank G. Tompkins, for appellant. J. E. McDonald, J. K. Henry, and Christie Benet, for respondent.

WOODS, J. On the 22d day of February, 1908, in the city of Columbia, the defendant, Wade H. Sellers, shot to death James P. Farmer. The plaintiff, May W. Farmer, the widow of James P. Farmer, having administered on his estate, recovered a judgment of $5,000 for the benefit of herself and his children against the defendant under the allegation that the homicide was committed "unlawfully, willfully, wantonly, recklessly, and maliciously." The defenses set up in the answer were, first, a general denial; second, that the defendant shot Farmer in the protection of his dwelling; third, self-defense; and, fourth, that the defendant had been tried for the murder of Farmer and had been acquitted. The exceptions relate to the second and third defenses.

The material undisputed facts are that early in the morning of February 22, 1908, Farmer went to defendant's dwelling, and as a dispensary constable several times demanded admittance for the purpose of searching the house for contraband liquor. The defendant bolted the doors and refused to open them. Farmer called to his assistance Policeman Nettles, who came up in the piazza, and then with a pistol in one hand forced open the door, and was shot to death by the defendant with a rifle. The plaintiff introduced evidence tending to prove that, before forcing an entrance, Farmer read to defendant a search warrant issued by Magistrate Fowles on January 4, 1908, authorizing and directing the sheriff or any constable to search the premises for a lot of contraband liquor, and that he broke open the door with the warrant in one hand and his pistol in the other only after solicitation had proved unavailing. The plaintiff introduced also documents signed by the Governor purporting to appoint Farmer a constable under the dispensary laws of the state. The defendant testified that he recognized Farmer as a dispensary constable, but denied that the search warrant was presented or read to him. He testified, further, that he told Farmer he would be admitted and could search the house as soon as the women in the house could dress, so that he could be admitted to their apartment, and that he shot when Farmer refused to wait, broke open the door, and pointed at him with his pistol. The substantial issues on the trial were: First. Was Farmer an officer whose authority to execute a search warrant the defendant was bound to respect or a mere trespasser? Second. Was Farmer's entrance into defendant's house under a search warrant which defendant was bound to respect, or was the paper a nullity? Third. Assuming Farmer to have been a mere trespasser, was it necessary for the defendant to kill him in self-defense or in the protection of his dwelling house? By objections to evidence and by requests to charge, the defendant asked the circuit judge to lay down as the law the utterly untenable proposition that the defendant could treat Farmer as a mere intruder in the office of constable and a bald trespasser on his premises because of certain alleged irregularities in his appointment and qualification as a constable. Section 38 of the dispensary statute of 1907 provided: "It shall be the duty of the sheriffs and their deputies, magistrates, constables, rural police, city and town officials, to enforce the provisions of this act. If they fail to do so, it is hereby made the duty of the governor to enforce the same, and he is hereby authorized to appoint such deputies, constables, and detectives as may be necessary." 25 Stat. 477. Under this law his excellency, the Governor, on December 22, 1907, issued a commission to Farmer as a constable, signed by the Governor and the Secretary of State, and sealed with the great seal of the state. This commission being by its terms limited to 30 days, the Governor on January 8, 1908, over his own signature alone, reappointed Farmer for 30 days, and again on February 6, 1908, in the same manner, reappointed him for another period of 30 days. If these appointments were valid, then Farmer held a legal appointment on February 22, 1908, the day of the homicide. The point is not made that a commission was necessary to the validity of the appointment; but the objection is that there was no official bond of Farmer in force at the date of the homicide.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] The court expressly decided in State v. Messervy, 86 S. C. 503, 68 S. E. 766, that constables appointed by the Governor under the act of 1907, above quoted, were not required to give bond, and that, even if they were, one holding the appointment of the Governor without giving the bond must be respected as a de facto officer. As against the objections made by the defendant, Farmer was a de jure officer entitled to exercise the powers of a dispensary constable.

[2] Respondent's argument embraces the point that the appointment of Farmer by the Governor was sufficient to clothe him with authority as a dispensary constable without a formal commission, but we pass that by because it is not made by the exceptions.

[3] It is obvious that no special appointment of Farmer by the magistrate was necessary. Section 22 of the act of 1907 (25 Stat. 472) provides that the search warrant shall empower "any officer or person who may be deputized" to make the search. Farmer, being an officer appointed for the express purpose of enforcing the dispensary law, was an officer within the terms of the law, and as such officer was authorized to execute the warrant without special appointment by the magistrate.

The position of most importance urged in support of the appeal is that a search warrant must be executed and returned within a reasonable time, that the question of what is a reasonable time is one of law to be decided by the court, and that the circuit judge should have held as a conclusion of law that the search warrant issued in this case on January 4, 1908, by reason of undue delay in its execution, was a nullity on February 22, 1908, when Farmer was killed in the effort to execute it. The only case to be found supporting this position is State v. Guthrie, 90 Me. 448, 38 Atl. 368. There a warrant issued for the arrest of defendant and the search of his premises was held to have expired before its execution three days after its date; and the defendant was accordingly discharged. The Maine statute required the officer to "make immediate return of the said warrant"; and the court held that the question whether the delay was unreasonable was a question of law for the court, and that, as there was no reason shown for the delay of three days, such delay must be declared unreasonable. It is important to observe that the question before the Maine court was whether the defendant should be discharged from arrest under the warrant, not whether he would have been justified in shooting an officer undertaking to enforce the warrant. The Constitution of South Carolina provides: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue except upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized." Article 1, § 16. This section is itself a declaration of the danger to the liberty of the citizen from searches and seizures of private property by public authority, and it imposes on officers the duty of issuing search warrants with careful discretion and executing them with reasonable caution and promptness. Having in view this provision of the Constitution, judges and juries, when such warrants are under review, should scrutinize them with care, to the end that there may be no unreasonable search or seizure of private property. But in deciding what is reasonable it is to be borne in mind that searches and seizures under the authority of law have been found by all civilized peoples necessary to protect life and property against the attacks of the criminal classes; and such process should not be set aside or declared void on slight or technical grounds. Here the ground of attack is that the warrant was not promptly executed, and it is insisted that the court should have charged the jury as a proposition of law that it had no force.

[4] Under the general rule adopted in this state, it is the province of the jury to determine what is reasonable promptness in the discharge of any duty imposed by law or by the act of the parties, unless only one conclusion can be drawn from the evidence. Edgefield Mfg. Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co., 78 S. C. 73, 58 S. E. 969; Chesterfield v. Ratliff, 52 S. C. 563, 30 S. E. 593, 41 L. R. A. 503; Hays v. Hays, 10 Rich. 419; Gray v. Bell, 2 Rich. 67, 44 Am. Dec. 277.

[5] It is true that in this case the delay of 48 days in serving the warrant seems long, but we are not prepared to say that no other conclusion can be drawn than that the delay was so unreasonable as to destroy the force of the warrant. A warrant cannot be legally enforced by an officer so long after its issuance that the search could not be reasonably referred to a bona fide effort for the recovery of the particular property therein mentioned. It cannot be held back by an executive officer as a menace to the citizen. But manifestly there can be no hard and fast limitation of time fixed by jujudicial authority as unreasonable in all cases and under all circumstances.

[6] Every case must depend on its own facts. The character of the person charged with having the stolen or contraband goods in possession, the nature of the crime charged, and other circumstances are to be taken into account. It is obvious to all men that a sporadic or untrained criminal and a professional criminal would stand on a different footing. In the case of an ordinary man suspected of being in possession of stolen goods or contraband liquor it might well be held beyond all doubt reasonable that a search warrant should be enforced within a few days. On the other hand, when the officer has the task of recovering stolen goods or taking contraband liquor from a trained and disciplined criminal, the enemy of society, it may take weeks of patient observation to ascertain the moment when a search would be of any avail. In such a case the enforcement of the law might be rendered impossible by a judicial holding that a reasonable time for the execution and return of a warrant is the same as in the case of an ordinary criminal. The distinction applies strongly in this case. There was evidence from the defendant himself that he was a professional criminal—one of that degraded class of men who apply their talents and energy to the acquisition of money in a nefarious business based on secret or defiant violations of law, and thus prey upon society. Under this evidence and other facts appearing in the case, the circuit judge properly submitted to the jury the question whether the execution of the warrant had been unreasonably delayed.

This conclusion makes unnecessary the consideration of the question whether the defendant would not have shot at his peril in resisting an officer demanding admittance under a search warrant even after the expiration of a reasonable time from the date of its issuance.

[7] Objection is also made to the warrant that it does not sufficiently describe the premises and the property. The following clause of the warrant describes the property to be seized about as definitely as it is possible to describe a lot of contraband liquor. "That the following contraband intoxicating liquors are now unlawfully in the possession, storage, and keeping of and on the premises occupied by W. H. Sellers in the state and county aforesaid, the said place being known as No. 1216 Gadsden St., in the city of Columbia, S. C., to wit, a lot of whisky, brandy, wine, rum, gin, and beer in barrels, demijohns, bottles, and other vessels, in the city of Columbia, S. C."

[8] There is no force in the objection that the affidavit describes the premises as 1216 Gadsden street, while the warrant directs the officer to enter into and search 1216 Gadsden street, "or other place appurtenant thereto." The point would be worthy of consideration if the homicide had occurred in the effort to enter and search any other place than the house known as 1216 Gadsden street; but the place which the officer undertook to enter was 1216 Gadsden street and no other.

[9] Nor is there any merit in the objection that the warrant directed the search to be made by day or by night when the statute forbids search of a dwelling house in the nighttime. No effort was made to search the dwelling house of the defendant in the nighttime, and there is therefore no ground to allege that the statute was violated. If courts gave heed to such extremely technical objections, the law would indeed be weak in its struggle with crime.

[10] We are unable to perceive how evidence that Mrs. Farmer, the plaintiff, was the prosecuting witness on the trial of defendant, Sellers, on the charge of murdering Farmer, could be of value to the defendant. It did not require such evidence to show that Mrs. Farmer had strong convictions against the defendant, for that was evident from the fact that she was the widow of the man whom defendant had killed, and that she had brought this action.

[11] Exception is taken to the italicized portion of the following instruction on the ground that it imposes the duty under all circumstances on the owner of a house to lay his hands gently upon an intruder: "I charge you that a person's home, his dwelling, is his castle, and he has the right to protect his own home from unlawful invasion. He has the right if the person comes into his home against his will to use such force as is necessary to protect himself from invasion—unlawful invasion of his home. He has no right to use any more force than is necessary, but has the right to oppose force with force, to protect his home by the exercise of just so much force as is necessary to protect it, or appears to be necessary from the circumstances surrounding him at the time. If a person invades your home, you have the right to eject him. Your duty in the first instance is to go and lay your hand on him gently, and, if he resists you, then you have got the right to oppose sufficient force to overcome his resistance." Farmer was killed while forcing his way into defendant's house. On that point there was no dispute. The practical question before the jury then was not whether the defendant took the proper means to get Farmer out, but whether he was justified in shooting him while he was forcing his way in, in order to prevent the entry or to prevent defendant's own death or serious bodily injury. On this issue the instruction was clearly given in other portions of the charge that, if Farmer was entering without authority of law, the defendant had a right to oppose him by force to the extent of taking his life if necessary. There is no ground for the assignments of error set out in the twelfth and fifteenth exceptions, for the substance of the requests of the defendant referred to in these exceptions was plainly given to the jury in the general charge.

[12] Defendant's counsel earnestly insist that there was error in refusing the following request: "If the deceased had threatened the life of defendant, and the defendant honestly believed that the deceased intended to carry out the threat by taking his life or doing some serious bodily harm, and the jury, viewing the circumstances from the standpoint of the defendant at the time of the fatal encounter, conclude as a reasonable man of ordinary reason and firmness that he was justified in the belief, then the defendant was entitled to be more watchful and to interpret the acts of the deceased more harshly than he otherwise would have been justified in doing." The Constitution forbids a trial judge to charge a jury with respect to matters of fact. Therefore, to tell the jury what force they should give to evidence of threats, or to any other evidence on a contested issue of fact, was beyond the province of the judge. The consideration of what inferences the defendant might properly draw and what action he might properly take in view of threats made against him was for the jury alone.

[13] Besides, the proposition submitted by the defendant is so perfectly obvious to all that to state it or to omit to state it to the jury could not possibly have affected the verdict. There was no error therefore in refusing the request.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

IRVINE v. TOWN OF GREENWOOD et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 2, 1911.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 724*)—TORTS—
—GROUNDS OF LIABILITY.

A city is not liable for its torts unless made so by statute, irrespective of the nature of the matter in connection with which the injury occurs, all its functions being considered of a governmental and public character, though carried on for profit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1545, 1568; Dec. Dig. § 724.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 733*)—TORTS—
—LIABILITY—NATURE OF FUNCTION—STREET LIGHTING.

Even were the distinction recognized between governmental functions and others, the lighting of streets is a governmental function; and no liability is imposed from that standpoint on the city for shock by contact with a wire hanging from a street arc light pole, though the city light plant also supplied private parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1547-1549; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 766*)—TORTS—
—DEFECTIVE STREETS.

Act 1892 (21 St. at Large, p. 91; Civ. Code 1902, § 2023), permitting one injured through a defect in a street to recover damages therefor, requires the city to keep the street in such repair that it is reasonably safe for travel, so that it would be bound to keep an electric lighting pole placed in the street, together with the wires attached thereto, in a safe condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1621, 1622; Dec. Dig. § 766.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 821*)—
STREETS—USE BY CHILDREN.

The court cannot say, as a matter of law, that the playing of children in the street is an illegitimate use thereof, which the city is not required to anticipate in maintaining the street in a safe condition; the question being ordinarily for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 821.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 821*)—
STREETS—INJURIES.

It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that a 17 year old boy is so old as to exclude him from the benefit of the rule requiring cities to keep streets safe for children playing therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 821.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 821*)—TORTS—
—INJURIES IN STREETS—JURY QUESTION—
CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether the danger to a child playing in the street, in coming in contact with a wire hanging from an electric lighting pole, was so apparent as to make it guilty of contributory negligence held a question for the jury, in an action against the city for resulting injuries.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by H. E. Irvine, as administrator of the estate of W. Claude Irvine, deceased, against the Town of Greenwood and others, Commissioners of Public Works of said town. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Tillman & Watson and Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellant. E. L. Richardson and Grier & Park, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The town of Greenwood owns and operates a municipal lighting plant, for the purpose of lighting its streets and furnishing electric current to its citizens for domestic purposes. This plant is controlled and managed by a board of public works, composed of three commissioners, elected by the qualified electors of the town, who are vested, by section 2010 of the Civil Code (volume 1), with full power and authority to build, maintain, operate, and manage the plant. This action was brought against the town of Greenwood and the board of public works by H. E. Irvine, as administrator, to recover damages for the alleged unlawful and wrongful killing of his son, Claude Irvine.

The facts, as alleged in the complaint, and established by the plaintiff's evidence, are these: On August 23, 1908, the deceased, a boy of 17 years of age, was engaged with two companions in playing a game known as "peg," on Jordan street, in the town of Greenwood, not far from its intersection with Parker street. On the side of Jordan street, a few feet from the point of intersection, and on the edge of the drain between the sidewalk and the street, was an electric light pole, from which an arc light was suspended. A metallic chain, used for the purpose of raising and lowering the light, hung down the side of the pole next to the street, and formed a loop about five or six feet above the ground. As Irvine, in the course of the game, was running from the street to the sidewalk near this post, he slipped on the edge of the drain, caught hold of the loop in an effort to save himself from falling, and was killed by a strong electric current transmitted to his body through the chain.

The complaint alleged, in substance, three acts of negligence and wantonness on the part of the defendants: First, that they had allowed the chain to come in contact with the wires overhead, and to hang a short distance above the street, so that any traveler might touch it; second, that the defendants had removed, or allowed to be removed, the insulation from the wires at the point of contact with the chain; third, that they had failed to equip the light with proper safety appliances. The defendants demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that no action would lie against a municipality or its agent for negligence in carrying on its corporate functions, unless such action were authorized by statute, and that no liability had been created by statute under the facts stated.

The circuit court sustained the demurrer as to the defendant the board of public works, but overruled it as to the defendant the town of Greenwood, holding that the acts of negligence specified in the complaint might be considered as a defect in the street, and that, under section 2023 of the Civil Code (volume 1), an action would lie against a municipality for injuries resulting therefrom. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was granted by the court, on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove that the deceased had not been guilty of contributory negligence when he received the injury. From this order of nonsuit, the plaintiff appeals.

[1] Whenever the question has arisen, it has been held in this state that a municipality is not liable in damages for a tort committed by any of its officers or agents, unless made so by statute. White v. City Council of Charleston, 2 Hill, 572; Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 290; Black v. City of Columbia, 19 S. C. 412, 45 Am. Rep. 785; Gibbes v. Beaufort, 20 S. C. 213; Parks v. Greenville, 44 S. C. 168, 21 S. E. 540; Matheney v. Aiken, 68 S. C. 163, 47 S. E. 58. Counsel for plaintiff, while acknowledging the authority of these cases, insist that they should be limited in application to such torts as are committed by a municipality in the exercise of its public and governmental functions, and should be held to have no application to torts committed by a municipality in the conduct of a business authorized by law for the advantage of the municipality, but distinct from the public or governmental functions of the corporation. The distinction contended for has the sanction of very high authority, including the Supreme Court of the United States. South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, 26 Sup. Ct. 110, 50 L. Ed. 261; Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 3 Am. Rep. 485; 1 Dillon on Mun. Corp. § 66. The numerous other authorities on the subject are collated in 28 Cyc. 1257, 1258, 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. 1191, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 664, 30 Am. St. Rep. 376.

Notwithstanding this weight of authority, we think there are cogent reasons for rejecting the distinction. The question was not decided in Mauldin v. Greenville, 33 S. C. 1, 11 S. E. 434, 8 L. R. A. 291. There the court held that, in the absence of express bestowal by the Legislature on the city of Greenville of the power to construct and maintain a plant to furnish electric lights in private residences and business houses, such a power was not implied in the general grant of authority "to make and establish all such rules, by-laws, and ordinances respecting the roads, streets, market and police department of said city, and the government thereof, as shall appear to them necessary and requisite for the security, welfare and convenience of said city, for preserving health, life, and property therein, and securing the peace and good government of the same." Here the question is whether the exercise of a particular power expressly conferred on a municipal corporation—a governmental agency—by the General Assembly shall be held to be a governmental function, or on the same legal footing as an ordinary business enterprise of a private corporation. The distinction was referred to in Childs v. City of Columbia, 87 S. C. 566, 70 S. E. 296, but no opinion as to its soundness was expressed; the case having been decided on other grounds.

In Hopkins v. Clemson College, 77 S. C. 12, 57 S. E. 551, the question was whether Clemson College, a corporation created for a public purpose, was liable for overflowing plaintiff's land in constructing a dike to protect the crops on the college lands from the floods in the Seneca river. This court held that the case fell within the rule laid down in Gibbes v. Beaufort, 20 S. C. 213,

Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 843, and the other cases decided in this state, cited above, and that therefore the plaintiff could not recover. On appeal the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of this court, holding that the flooding of plaintiff's land was the taking of private property without due process of law, and that the taking was by the corporation itself, for corporate purposes, and not by its officers or agents. As we understand, it was on these grounds that the case was distinguished from Gibbes v. Beaufort, supra, and other like cases decided in this state. The doctrine of the decision, however, is not applicable to this case, for the reason that here there is no taking of private property by the corporation, but an injury, resulting in death, from the alleged failure of an employé of the municipality to perform the duties imposed on him by the municipality.

In endeavoring to put into practical effect the supposed distinction between public function and private business or enterprise of municipal corporations, it will hardly be doubted that the courts will find themselves involved in a maze of shadowy distinctions. Where is the line of demarcation to be drawn? If it could be satisfactorily laid out now, it could not long continue to receive general recognition; for the functions of government, especially municipal government, are being extended almost every day. That which to-day might clearly appear to be a private business of the corporation, authorized by law, in a short time might appear to be a plain public obligation and a governmental function. Take, for example, the water supply of a city. A short time ago it was held that, while a city exercised a public function in providing water for its fire engines, although used almost exclusively for the protection of private property, yet when it ran pipes to private houses, and there supplied water to its inhabitants for drinking and other domestic purposes, it was acting outside of true governmental functions, and engaging in private business. Judson v. Borough of Winsted, 80 Conn. 384, 68 Atl. 999, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 91. At this time it will hardly be doubted that when a city, under legislative sanction, undertakes to furnish water to its inhabitants it performs a public and governmental function; for nothing can be more important to the municipal public than the prevention of disease, and nothing so promotes the public health as a supply to all citizens of pure water. This is but an illustration of the truth that, with advancing civilization, not only do the duties of individuals increase, but the public and governmental duties and functions of the state and of municipalities embrace more subjects.

Expressing the inclination of the court to reject the distinction contended for, Mr. Justice McGowan says, in Black v. Columbia, 19 S. C. 412, 45 Am. Rep. 785: "With all due respect, it seems to us that if the powers granted to a municipal corporation are susceptible of such division and separation it would be exceedingly difficult to carry the doctrine into anything like uniform practice. Opinions must certainly differ, both as to the proper classification of the powers and the character of the duty imposed by them. The necessity of determining in each case whether a particular power should be ranked in the class of corporate, as distinguished from civil, powers, and if the former, whether its exercise imposes a duty, discretionary or merely ministerial, must be the source of constantly recurring difficulties, and tend to great confusion and uncertainty in the administration of the law." The confusion which has resulted from the refinements and distinctions attempted by other courts with respect to the liability of municipal corporations for torts committed by officers or employes is so great that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to deduce from them a rule which could be applied with confidence by the public or the bar. This is made apparent by the study of any well-considered text or opinion on the subject, such as the opinion of Chief Justice Gray, in Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332, and the note to Goddard v. Harpswell (Me.) 30 Am. St. Rep. 376.

After much consideration of the authorities in this state and elsewhere, it seems to us the more logical conclusion that the courts should not undertake to say that any functions of a municipal corporation are private and not governmental, but, on the contrary, should hold that municipal corporations are created solely for public and governmental purposes, and that all powers granted to them by the General Assembly, under the sanction of the Constitution, are to be exercised as public and governmental functions, for the benefit of the municipal community. Indeed, this view of powers granted is required by the definition of a municipality, for an essential part of the definition is that the charter be granted for the purpose of subordinate self-government. Certain it is that sections 3, 4, and 5 of article 8 of the Constitution of this state contemplate that the construction and operation of water and electric plants, not only for the purposes of the corporation, strictly speaking, but for supplying citizens of the municipality with light and water, shall be a public purpose, for which the municipality may incur debts and levy taxes.

There is another strong reason for the rejection of the distinction contended for, which applies with special force in this state. Municipalities are brought into existence by the legislative branch of the government, and it is peculiarly the province of the General Assembly, not only to confer the powers, but to determine the extent of the liability of such corporations. Having in view the doctrine long ago laid down by the courts of this state, that municipal corporations are liable for torts only when made so by legislative enactment, the General Assembly has by law expressed its will as to the extent of the liability of such corporations for torts. The courts are therefore bound to restrict the liability to the terms of the statute; and the statute authorizes no distinction between governmental and public duties and supposed private municipal enterprises.

[2] But, even if the distinction contended for were recognized, we do not think this case could fall under it. The death of plaintiff's intestate was due to contact with a wire suspended from a pole supporting one of the arc lights, put up for the purpose of illuminating the streets of the town of Greenwood. The lighting of the streets of a city is universally recognized as a public and governmental function. It cannot alter the case that the same plant which supplied electricity for the street light also supplied the electricity for the lights in private dwellings and business houses.

[3] The next question is whether the alleged tort of the municipal authorities fell within the terms of the act of 1892 (21 Stat. 91), now incorporated in the Civil Code as section 2023, which reads as follows: "Any person who shall receive bodily injury, or damages in his person or property through a defect in any street, causeway, bridge, or public way, or by reason of defect or mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation within the limits of any town or city, may recover, in an action against the same, the amount of actual damages sustained by him by reason thereof. If any such defect in a street, causeway or bridge existed before such injury or damage occurred, such damage shall not be recovered by the person so injured if his load exceed the ordinary weight: Provided, the said corporation shall not be liable unless such defect was occasioned by its neglect or mismanagement; provided, further, such person has not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his or her own negligent act or negligently contributed thereto." In the case of Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 843, the court, construing the statute in the light of its title, held that the liability created by it was limited to misfeasance or nonfeasance connected with the keeping of "any street, causeway, bridge, or public way" in proper repair. This construction has been followed in cases arising since the statute was incorporated in the Civil Code. Hutchinson v. Summerville, 66 S. C. 448, 45 S. E. 8; Bryant v. Orangeburg, 70 S. C. 142, 49 S. E. 229. But we are unable to give the duty of keeping streets in repair the narrow meaning contended for by respondents. To keep a street in repair means to keep it in such physical condition that it will be reasonably safe for street purposes. It is not enough that its surface should be safe; a street is not in repair when poles or wires or other structures are so placed in or over it as to be dangerous to those making a proper use of the street. In Duncan v. Greenville, 71 S. C. 170, 50 S. E. 776, it was held that a wagon left on the public road, so as to put travelers in peril, must be regarded under the statute as a failure to keep the road in repair. In this case the pole was placed in the street as a fixture, and became a part of the street, which it became the duty of the municipal authorities to keep safe.

Forceful argument was presented in support of the position that no cause of action arose because the street was safe for the ordinary purposes of travel, and plaintiff's intestate, who was 17 years of age, would not have been killed if he had not been using the street for the purpose of playing a ball game, a purpose for which it was not intended; and that the nonsuit must be sustained on that ground. The court has given much consideration to this question, important not only to the parties in this case, but to the general public.

There can be no doubt that the main purpose of streets and roads is for travel. They serve this purpose, not only as avenues of traffic and of social communication, but as a means for the people to obtain at will the pleasurable sensation of locomotion and change of scene and environment. In furtherance of these purposes, streets and roads are now burdened with street railways and trolley lines. The necessity of having the streets lighted, in order that they may serve these purposes, makes any reasonable means to that end, such as the placing of electric light wires, a proper burden on the streets of a town or city. But while those mentioned above are the main and dominant purposes of a street, to which, when the occasion arises, others must yield, still there are other purposes for which streets and roads have always been used, and which become more and more urgent as population becomes more and more dense. One who wishes to build on a city lot must often of necessity be allowed temporary use of a portion of the street for placing his material. Streets and roads are often used for public meetings held for the enlightenment or amusement of the people. So, likewise, children and youths have always used streets for their sports, subject to the regulation of municipal ordinance, and subject to the use of the streets for the other purposes above set out. The necessity for reasonable use of this kind becomes constantly more pressing with the increase in the size of towns and cities, and the decrease of home space. To vast numbers of boys and girls the street affords the only place of sport and the only outlook from a pent-up home. The interest of the state is no less vital that these boys and girls should have a place for development of body and spirit by out of door sport, than its interest that they should have the public school as a place for mental training. Indeed, it is not to be doubted that arrested and abnormal development of men and women, which results in the great burden of crime borne by society, is due largely to the lack of parks and playgrounds, where the joy of activity in the fresh air may be found.

[4] It is no doubt true that the primary duty of the municipal authorities is to keep the streets safe and in good condition for travel, and if in doing that it becomes necessary to make them unfit and dangerous for the play of boys and girls no responsibility falls on the municipality; and it is also true that the police power extends to forbidding play in streets dangerous or unfit for that purpose from any cause; nevertheless, municipal authorities are bound to take notice of and have a reasonable regard for the fact that many streets are used for the play of boys and girls, and that they may be properly so used, without material interference with the main uses above set out. Viewing the general use of the street by boys and girls for play, and the long acquiescence by the public in such use, when it has not interfered with the other uses mentioned, and considering the growing scope of the duties of the state, and especially of municipal corporations, to the individual, it seems clear that the court should not lay it down, as a proposition of law applicable to all cases, that playing by boys and girls while they are still of the age of youthful sportiveness is an illegitimate use of a street, not to be anticipated by the authorities whose duty it is to keep highways in a reasonably safe condition.

The earlier and later authorities on the subject are in direct conflict. The doctrine first held in this country is thus forcibly stated by Chief Justice Bigelow, in Blodgett v. Boston, 8 Allen (Mass.) 237, which was an action for damages received by a boy 11 years old, while engaged in play on a street: "The highway is to be kept safe and convenient for all persons having occasion to pass over it, while engaged in any of the pursuits or duties of life. If this be not the limit beyond which the duty and corresponding liability of cities and towns in relation to the subject-matter do not extend, we are unable to see where the line can be drawn. And yet it is plain that there must be some limit. A town cannot be held responsible for every case of damage to person or property which may happen by reason of a defect in a highway, without regard to the use to which it was appropriated at the time of the accident by the person injured. Suppose, for example, a juggler or gymnast should occupy a portion of a street or road to exhibit his feats of skill or agility or strength. He certainly could not be regarded in the light of a traveler while so using the highway; nor could he claim damages of a city or town for injuries sustained by him in his person or property during the performance, although they might have been occasioned in whole or in part by a defect in the highway. Take another example of a different character. A boy, while using a portion of a highway solely for the purpose of enjoying the amusement of sliding over the snow in a sled, meets with an injury attributable to some defect arising from the accumulation of snow or ice. It would hardly be contended that the city or town in which such an accident happened could be held liable for the damages thereby occasioned."

The same doctrine was stated and applied in Tighe v. Lowell, 119 Mass. 472, and Hunt v. Salem, 121 Mass. 294. These cases were decided, it is true, under a statute which gave a right of action to "travelers," for injuries received from defects in the highway, while our statute provides for the recovery of damages by "any person who shall receive bodily injury. * * *" But there are other cases laying down the same rule in states where no limitation of the right of action to travelers was expressed in the statute. Reed v. Madison, 83 Wis. 171, 53 N. W. 547, 17 L. R. A. 733; Chicago v. Starr, 42 Ill. 177, 89 Am. Dec. 422. The cases cited held, however, that the rule of nonliability extended only to children who were using the street exclusively for play, and not to children who, in going from one place to another, stopped to gratify their curiosity, or to indulge their natural tendency to sportiveness; the diversion or play in such cases being regarded as a mere incident of the travel, to be expected of children in their use of streets for travel.

The matter has not been before any court of last resort in this state, but the conclusion we have stated is in accord with all the later decisions. Modern judicial opinion and the reason for it is thus expressed in Gibson v. Huntington, 38 W. Va. 177, 18 S. E. 447, 22 L. R. A. 561, 45 Am. St. Rep. 853: "Poor parents are unable to provide a place of healthful exercise and play for their children, for it requires all their earnings to clothe, feed, and shelter them. The law prohibits them, under the penalty of being trespassers, from entering on the lands of others; and now to forbid them to use the road to its utmost boundary for the purpose of play, when not interfering in any manner with the traveling public, would savor too much of the Dark Ages of barbarism, when children were subject to inhuman, diabolical punishments, and their lives were at the mercy of those having charge over them. The roads are the only commons children now have, and to confine them in the narrow limits of their tenement houses would be cruel, unjust, and oppressive,

The same principle has been applied in the following cases: Owensboro v. York, 117 Ky. 294, 77 S. W. 1130, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1439; Covington v. Drexilius, 120 Ky. 493, 87 S. W. 266, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 903, 117 Am. St. Rep. 593; McGuire v. Spence, 91 N. Y. 303, 43 Am. Rep. 668; Chicago v. Keefe, 114 Ill. 222, 2 N. E. 267, 55 Am. Rep. 860; Busse v. Rogers, 120 Wis. 443, 98 N. W. 219, 64 L. R. A. 183; Straub v. St. Louis, 175 Mo. 413, 75 S. W. 100; Stodd v. Philadelphia (C. C.) 183 Fed. 659; Augusta v. Tharpe, 113 Ga. 152, 38 S. E. 389; Rome v. Suddeth, 116 Ga. 649, 42 S. E. 1032; Omaha v. Richards, 49 Neb. 244, 68 N. W. 528; Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 9 N. E. 155, 58 Am. Rep. 65; Kunz v. Troy, 104 N. Y. 344, 10 N. E. 442, 58 Am. Rep. 508; Vicksburg v. McLain, 67 Miss. 4, 6 South. 774; Beaudin v. Bay City, 136 Mich. 333, 99 N. W. 285, 4 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 248, and note; note, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 753.

[5] It is true that in the decisions cited the ages of the children injured ranged from 3 to 14 years; but we do not think this court can say, as a matter of law, that a boy of 17 has passed the age of youthful sportiveness, and reached such a mature age that play in the street is not to be expected of him, nor allowed to him. We express no opinion as to the correctness of the rulings of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, in Jackson v. Greenville, 72 Miss. 220, 16 South. 382, 27 L. R. A. 527, 48 Am. St. Rep. 553, and of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Vosburgh v. Moak, 1 Cush. 453, 48 Am. Dec. 613, that grown men playing with a dog, or playing ball on a street, are not making a legitimate or permissible use of the street, and cannot recover for injuries due to a defect in the street, for this case is different.

[6] Under some circumstances and in some localities, it would no doubt be held an improper use of the street, and contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for boys of 17 to incur the risk of playing on the street. But there are no circumstances here to take the case out of the general rule that it is for the jury to determine, under all the circumstances, whether the use of the street by the boys was a legitimate use, and whether the danger was so apparent that they were guilty of contributory negligence.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause be remanded to that court for a new trial.

JOHNSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 22, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 762, 863*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTION—OPINION OF COURT.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Will Johnson, was the aggressor, and that he, actuated by malice aforethought, either express or implied, with a pistol shot the deceased, Will Solomon, at the time and place in the manner charged in the indictment, then the defendant would be guilty of the offense of murder, and you would be authorized in convicting him." This charge was not without evidence to support it, nor did it contain an expression of opinion by the court that the accused was the aggressor. Nor was the substantial repetition of the same instruction to the jury, in a recharge at their request, erroneous, on the ground that it was given at the conclusion of such recharge, or on the ground that it inflamed the minds of the jury, and was prejudicial to the accused, as focusing the minds of the jury upon the theory that the accused was the aggressor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1750-1759, 2065-2067; Dec. Dig. §§ 762, 863; * Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 581, 656.]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 200*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATION.

The court did not err in admitting the statement of the decedent as to the cause of his death and the person who killed him. There was evidence that the decedent, at the time he made the declaration, was in a dying condition, and was conscious of the fact. Penal Code 1910, § 1026.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 419, 420, 448, 696*)—HOMICIDE (§ 338*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—OPINION—WRIT OF ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR.

The evidence of a witness that he heard another person say, upon hearing the report of the pistol that killed the decedent, "He has shot that boy," was objectionable as hearsay evidence and the expression of an opinion (Carr v. State, 76 Ga. 592 [3]), and, not being strictly responsive to any question propounded by counsel for the accused, should have been excluded upon his motion; but, as the remark was so indefinite that it could apply as well to the decedent as to the accused, as the party doing the shooting, and as there was only one shot fired, and the accused in his statement admitted firing the shot that killed the deceased, the refusal of the court to rule out the remark as hearsay was manifestly not hurtful to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 973-983; Dec. Dig. §§ 419, 420, 448, 696; * Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 709-713; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTION—SELF-DEFENSE.

The court stated a correct legal principle in instructing the jury that "One would not be justified, under the law of self-defense, in killing another to prevent the commission of an injury upon him which would amount to nothing more than a misdemeanor." This charge was not erroneous for either of the following reasons: (a) That "it was confusing and misleading, in that it failed to instruct the jury of what offense the defendant might be guilty;" (b) that "it deprived the defendant of the right to defend himself against an apparent danger, and virtually instructed the jury that, before the defendant would be authorized to act in self-defense, he must first wait and ascertain whether his adversary only intended to inflict some misdemeanor on him, or whether he intended to commit a felony, before the defendant would be justified in acting at all;" and (c) that "a seeming necessity, if acted upon in good faith, would be equivalent to a real necessity; and for the court to instruct the jury as he did in this case it deprived him of this right." There is no assignment of error that the court did not elsewhere instruct the jury as to the doctrine of a seeming necessity, acted upon in good faith, being equivalent to an actual necessity. Moreover, it appears from the charge in the record that the court fully and clearly instructed the jury on the subject.

5. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTION—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

The court further charged the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that Will Solomon [the decedent] was the aggressor and committed on the defendant an ordinary battery by striking the defendant with some instrument, or that he was attempting to commit on the defendant ordinary battery, an injury less than a felony, and that by reason of being attacked by the deceased, or by reason of such attempted injury upon him, that violent impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible was excited in the defendant, and the defendant, acting under such impulse of passion, shot and killed the deceased, Will Solomon, he would not be guilty of the offense of murder, but you would be authorized in finding him guilty of the offense of voluntary manslaughter." This charge was not erroneous on the ground that "it confused the law of justification with the law of voluntary manslaughter, and excluded entirely from the jury's consideration other equivalent circumstances which might be sufficient, under the law, to mitigate the offense."

6. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—OVERRULING MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The evidence in the record does not disclose a strong case for murder against the plaintiff in error; but this court cannot say that the verdict for that offense was wholly unauthorized by the evidence, nor that the trial judge abused his discretion in overruling the motion for a new trial.

ROBERTS v. TIFT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1911.)

1. EJECTMENT (§ 76*)—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

An amendment laying a new demise and preserving the action can be made in the fictitions form of ejectment, although the original declaration contained only a demise of a person dead at the time of the commencement of the suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 159*)—TRANSACTIONS WITH PERSONS SINCE DECEASED—SURVIVING PARTY TO CONTRACT—COMPETENCY.

On the trial of an action of ejectment, a lessor was competent to testify that another lessor, in whose name a prior demise was laid, at a given time executed and delivered to the witness as grantee a deed to certain described land for which the action was brought; that the witness saw the grantor sign the instrument in the presence of two named witnesses, neither of whom was an officer; that both of the witnesses and the grantor had since died; that the instrument was lost and could not be found; and that it had never been recorded, the personal representatives or transferee of such grantor not being a party to the suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

3. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT OF DEFENDANT'S CONTENTIONS.

There was no merit in the grounds of the motion for a new trial based upon the alleged failure of the judge to properly state the contentions of the defendant below upon the trial of the case.

4. EJECTMENT (§ 9*)—RIGHT OF ACTION—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—OUTSTANDING TITLE.

The court charged the jury as follows: "Now, the defendant insists that he purchased some portion of the land in dispute, and that he has a right to hold the land as his. The court charges you that the defendant has a right to set up any paramount title to this property, set up any title that is the best title to this property; and, if you believe from the evidence that he holds the true title and that it has descended from the true owners, and that Capt. Tift [the plaintiff] has not complied with the law, and has not come up to the requirements of the law, which gives prescriptive title, why the defendant would be entitled to recover, and your verdict would be in favor of the defendant." This instruction was calculated to impress the jury with the idea that, before they would be authorized to find in favor of the defendant, the evidence had to be sufficient to show that the defendant held under a paramount outstanding title; that is, if it appeared from the evidence that there was an outstanding title superior to that of the plaintiff, he could nevertheless recover if the defendant was not connected with such outstanding superior title. The law is that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title; and therefore, if at the trial an outstanding title be shown superior to that of the plaintiff, he cannot recover, although it be not shown that the defendant had title. As there was evidence tending to show an outstanding paramount title with which the defendant was not connected, the instruction was hurtful error to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 16-29; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—EFFECT—PRESCRIPTIONS.

It was not error to charge the jury, in effect, that a prescriptive title, when fully shown by the evidence, is good as against the true owner of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

Error from Superior Court, Tift County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by H. H. Tift against Gillis Roberts.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. B. Murrow, Ellis, Webb & Ellis, and Ellis & Ellis, for plaintiff in error. Fulwood & Murray, J. M. Terrell, and Hal Lawson, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. [1] One of the assignments of error raises the question, whether the declaration in the fictitious form of ejectment, as used in this state, can be amended by laying a new demise, when the only demise laid in the original declaration was in the name of a lessor who was dead at the time the suit was brought. No ruling of a controlling nature has been made by this court on the question. In Neal v. Robertson, 18 Ga. 399, Starnes, J., used in an obiter dictum language strongly persuasive as to the right to make such amendment. While deciding that an amendment to a statutory action for land brought under the act of 1847, which proposed to insert other plaintiffs, was not allowable, he said: "The right to make the amendment moved in this case has been put upon the ground of the practice which prevails in actions of ejectment at common law of laying several demises in several lessors. If this were such a proceeding, there can be no doubt that, under our laws as they now stand with respect to amendments, at any stage of the cause an amendment might be made, inserting a new demise and new lessors. But this would be permitted upon the principle which lies at the foundation of that proceeding, viz., that John Doe is the real plaintiff, that he is the lessee or tenant of those in whom the demises are laid, and, by reason of the fiction upon which the frame of the action rests, these lessors, instead of being different parties, are all in union of interest with the plaintiff. When, therefore, a recovery is had by and through the title of either of these lessors, that recovery is held to inure to the benefit of the plaintiff, John Doe, and through him it is supposed to operate for the benefit of that lessor who is the actual party in interest. So that, when the writ of habere facias issues (though at the point of time when it becomes necessary to execute it the operation of the fiction ceases, and the sheriff is required to put the lessor, whose title is successful, in possession), it issues for the benefit of the plaintiff, John Doe, or, rather, through him for the benefit of that lessor who is the real person in interest. Some courts have required that the consent of all the lessors should be obtained before their names are used. In which event this mutuality of interest is supposed to be rendered certain." As a matter of practice there seems heretofore to have been no question as to the right to lay a new demise by amendment to a declaration in ejectment proper, where the sole lessor in the original declaration was dead when the action was brought. This practice was recognized in the following cases: Roe v. Doe, 30 Ga. 873; Pollard v. Tait, 38 Ga. 439; Head v. Driver, 79 Ga. 179, 3 S. E. 621; Jones v. Johnson, 81 Ga. 293, 6 S. E. 181. In each of the cases just cited the justice writing the opinion noted the fact that the sole lessor in the original declaration was not in life when the action was begun; but there was no intimation that this fact would prevent the laying of a new demise in the name of another lessor. In Head v. Driver, supra, in which Chief Justice Bleckley wrote the opinion, all the demises were laid in the name of a person dead at the commencement of the suit. The plaintiff offered an amendment not laying a new demise or alleging a new lessor, but setting up an additional fact as to the merits of the case. In the concluding portion of the opinion the Chief Justice dealt with this proposed amendment, not by showing that the amendment laying a new demise was not permissible, but that the amendment offered would not have helped the plaintiff, or prevented a nonsuit, if it had been allowed. This court has frequently decided that a suit can be maintained only by or in behalf of a natural or artificial person, and that, where an action is instituted by one not having capacity to sue, the proceeding, is a mere nullity, and contains nothing to amend by. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Inman Park Presbyterian Church, 111 Ga. 677, 36 S. E. 880, and cases cited; Wynn v. Richard Allen Lodge, 115 Ga. 796, 42 S. E. 29; Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Dalton Marble Works, 122 Ga. 774, 50 S. E. 978. And see Clark Bros. v. Wyche, 126 Ga. 24, 26, 54 S. E. 909. It has also been ruled in several cases by this court that there can be no recovery in ejectment proper where the sole lessor of the plaintiff was dead when the suit was brought. Head v. Driver, supra, citing Jones v. Tarver, 19 Ga. 280 (6); Goodtitle v. Roe, 20 Ga. 135; Watson v. Tindal, 24 Ga. 494 (5), 503, 71 Am. Dec. 142; Doe v. Roe, 29 Ga. 45 (2). It is also the rule that, if the lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment had no title at the commencement of the action, the plaintiff cannot recover on that demise. Hobby v. Bunch, 83 Ga. 1 (3), 10 S. E. 113, 20 Am. St. Rep. 301; Suwannee Turpentine Co. v. Baxter, 109 Ga. 597, 35 S. E. 142. And the same is true if the plaintiff's lessor had no title at the date of the demise. Scisson v. McLaws, 12 Ga. 166; Foster v. Stapler, 64 Ga. 766. Moreover, the rule is that "no amendment adding a new and distinct cause of action or new and distinct parties shall be allowed, unless expressly provided for by law." Civ. Code 1910, § 5683. This, so far as we know, has ever been the rule of practice in this state, at least since the adoption of the Code of 1863. See section 3411 of that Code. Notwithstanding the doctrines that no action can be maintained except in the name of a natural or artificial person, that there can be no recovery in ejectment where the sole lessor of the plaintiff was dead when the suit was brought, or at the date of the demise, or had no title at the date of the demise or at the commencement of the action, and that no amendment is allowable at law which adds a new party or a new cause of action, it has ever been the practice in this state to allow by amendment at any time before the trial the introduction of a new lessor of the plaintiff in the action of ejectment proper (Pollard v. Tait, 38 Ga. 439; Jones v. Johnson, supra), although every demise of this character introduces a new party to the suit, as well as a new cause of action (Id.; Burbage v. Fitzgerald, 98 Ga. 582, 25 S. E. 554). It has been held, moreover, that where the sole lessor of the plaintiff in the action of ejectment dies pending the suit the case may proceed to trial for the recovery of costs. Watson v. Tindal; Doe v. Roe, supra. Furthermore, this court has subscribed to the doctrine "that, if the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the premises at the time the demise is laid, it will be sufficient, although his right of possession be divested before the trial; for the action of ejectment is intended to give the party compensation for the trespass as well as to enable him to recover possession of the land, and he has the right to proceed for such trespass, although his right to the possession should cease." Harris v. Cannon, 6 Ga. 382, 389, citing Adams on Ejectment, 33. If the nominal plaintiff in the action of ejectment proper is a sufficient legal entity to authorize the continuance of the action in his name for the recovery of costs where his sole lessor dies pending the suit, and if the action may proceed in his name for the trespass, where his sole lessor was entitled to the possession of the premises at the time the demise was laid, although his right of possession be divested before trial, it would certainly seem to be true that the fictitious plaintiff is a sufficient legal entity to authorize a new demise to be laid by amendment, where the sole lessor in the original declaration was dead at the commencement of the suit. Moreover, if a suit in ejectment proper can be well brought in the name of a fictitious plaintiff upon the demise of a living lessor who had no title at the time the demise was laid, or who had parted with the title prior to the commencement of the suit, and an amendment can be made upon the trial by laying a new demise from a lessor who had title at the time of the new demise, and at the time the suit was brought, which under our practice is certainly allowable, no good reason occurs to us why a new demise may not be laid by amendment in the name of a lessor having title and the right of possession at the time of the laying of such new demise and at the time of the commencement of the action, although the sole lessor in the original declaration was dead at the time the suit was brought. Our conclusion is that such an amendment as is last referred to is allowable. Powell on Actions for Land, § 118, note 5.

Two grounds of the motion for a new trial complain of error in the exclusion of certain evidence offered by the defendant below. An examination of the brief of evidence sent up in the record shows that the evidence alleged to have been excluded was admitted. The other grounds of the motion for a new trial are sufficiently dealt with in the headnotes relating thereto. The judgment refusing a new trial is reversed, upon the error in the instruction set forth in the fourth headnote.

TATUM v. LEIGH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 22, 1911.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 537*)—OFFICERS—LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS.

Where a private corporation, owing a debt on which a suit is pending, ceases to carry on the corporate business and sells all of its property, and its officers, being its only stockholders, appropriate all of the proceeds of sale to their individual use, thus leaving no other assets from which to pay the corporate debt, in an equitable suit by the creditor against the corporation and officers, for the purpose of charging the latter as trustees and as liable for the debt, the corporation, upon facts as just stated, is to be regarded as in a state of insolvency.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 545*)—OFFICERS—DUTIES AND LIABILITIES—APPLICATION OF FUNDS.

Under facts as above enumerated, the officers of the corporation would be under duty to apply the proceeds of sale primarily to the payment of the debts of the corporation, and could not, for their personal benefit, lawfully apply such proceeds to the payment of existing debts owing to them individually, or give preference to existing debts which the corporation owed to other persons, and for which such officers were primarily liable; such payments or preferences not having been made in the performance of any agreement or understanding entered into at or prior to the time when the liabilities were incurred, or before the insolvency of the corporation. Lowry Banking Co. v. Empire Lumber Co., 91 Ga. 624-630, 17 S. E. 968 et seq., and citations; Atlas Tack Co. v. Macon Hardware Co., 101 Ga. 391, 29 S. E. 27; Crawford v. Roney, 130 Ga. 515, 61 S. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2170-2175; Dec. Dig. § 545.*]

8. CORPORATIONS (§ 548*)—OFFICERS—LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS.

After judgment in such a pending suit as mentioned in the first headnote, followed by due issuance of execution and entry of nulla bona thereon, a petition against the corporation and its officers in a court of equity, alleging the procurement of such a judgment and return of nulla bona on the execution, and other facts as specified in the first headnote, and, further, that the defendant officers had actual notice of the debt and pending suit at the time of sale, but nevertheless, upon demand, refused to pay the amount specified in the execution, and praying to charge the officers as trustees, and for a judgment against them individually for the amount of the debt, was not subject to general demurrer. In this connection, see Lamar v. Allison, 101 Ga. 270, 28 S. E. 686.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2182–2186; Dec. Dig. § 548.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 605*)—TERMINATION OF EXISTENCE—NONUSER OF FRANCHISE.

A corporation, by merely ceasing to exercise its franchise and selling all of its property, does not cease to exist. Lamar v. Allison, 101 Ga. 270–274, 28 S. E. 686; 1 Cook on Stock and Stockholders (3d Ed.) § 631.

5. VENUE (§ 22*)—RESIDENCE OF PARTIES—CODEFENDANTS.

The venue of a suit of the character mentioned in the third headnote may be laid in the county of the residence of any one of the defendants against whom substantial relief is prayed; and the petition in the present case was not subject to the separate demurrer of one of the officers of the corporation, alleged to reside in a different county from that in which the suit was brought, which complained that the facts alleged showed that the court was without jurisdiction as to him.

6. BANKRUPTCY (§ 426*)—DISCHARGE OF BANKRUPT—DEBTS DISCHARGED.

An indebtedness of an officer of a private corporation, created by his misappropriation of the funds of such corporation, is not dischargeable in bankruptcy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Dec. Dig. § 426.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

7. BANKRUPTCY (§ 426*)—DEBTS DISCHARGED—"OFFICER."

The word "officer" as used in Bankruptcy Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 17a (4), 30 Stat. 550 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3428), excepting from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy debts created by the bankrupt's fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or defalcation while acting as an officer, includes an officer of a private corporation.

ATKINSON, J. [1–5] 1–5. It is unnecessary to elaborate the ruling announced in headnotes 1 to 5, inclusive.

[6] 6. J. W. Tatum, who was president of the corporation and one of the directors, filed a separate plea, admitting that half of the proceeds derived from the sale of all of the corporate property had been applied to the payment of notes due to the National Bank of Brunswick, which he and his codefendant Abrams, who was a director and also the secretary and treasurer of the corporation, had made individually, and that the other half was applied to his own use, but setting up that the notes so held by the bank had been given for money borrowed on account, and expended for the use, of the corporation, and were entitled to be paid out of the funds of the corporation, and the other half of the funds which was so applied to his own use went in part payment of valid and existing debts which the corporation owed to him individually. At the trial, which was held at the June term, 1910, of the court, the defendant offered an amendment to his original plea, setting up that, on the 21st day of May, 1910, he had been duly adjudged a voluntary bankrupt in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Northern District of Alabama, and having been so adjudged he is now a bankrupt; that the time of making his application for discharge has not expired, and he intends in good faith, within the time provided by law, to make application for a discharge from all provable debts against him; that the debt sued upon in this case was contracted and became due before the filing of the petition and adjudication in bankruptcy; that the plaintiff was duly scheduled in bankruptcy as one of the unsecured creditors, and was given notice and had actual knowledge of the proceeding in bankruptcy; that his contemplated discharge, when granted, will release the defendant from all liability upon the indebtedness sued upon in this case; and thereupon he prayed that the suit be suspended and stayed until after adjudication or dismissal of his petition in bankruptcy, and until the question of the final discharge is determined, etc. Error is assigned upon the ruling of the judge disallowing this amendment. The question whether an indebtedness of an officer of a private corporation, created by his misappropriation of the funds of such corporation, is dischargeable in bankruptcy is presented by an exception to the disallowance of an amendment to the plea of the defendant, Tatum. An indebtedness created by a misappropriation of the funds of a private corporation by a director, while acting in the capacity of president of such corporation, falls within the meaning of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 17a (4), 30 Stat. 550 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3428), declaring that "a discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as * * * (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity."

[7] It was held in Re Harper (D. C.) 133 Fed. 970, that the word "officer," as used in section 17, cl. 4, included officers of a private corporation. It was accordingly decided that an indebtedness created by the embezzlement and misappropriation of the funds of the bank by the debtor, while acting in the capacity of vice president of the bank, and having full control of its affairs, was one created by his fraud, embezzlement, and misappropriation while acting as an officer, and therefore was not dischargeable in bankruptcy. While the point as to whether he was acting in a fiduciary capacity, within the meaning of clause 4 of the seventeenth section of the bankruptcy act, was discussed by the District Judge, it was not adjudicated. On a review of this case by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit (Harper v. Rankin, 141 Fed. 626, 72 C. C. A. 320), the judgment rendered in the District Court was affirmed upon the ground that the vice president of the bank, in creating the indebtedness by his embezzlement and misappropriation of the funds of the bank, was acting in a fiduciary capacity, within the meaning of section 17a, cl. 4, of the bankruptcy act; the court stating that it did not deem it necessary to pass upon the point whether an officer of a private corporation came within the scope of the section and clause of the act referred to. A petition in the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, for a writ of certiorari to be directed to the Circuit Court of Appeals, was denied. Harper v. Rankin, 200 U. S. 621, 26 Sup. Ct. 758, 50 L. Ed. 624. Therefore the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals was allowed to stand affirmed by the Supreme Court, but whether upon the point that the vice president of the bank was an officer, as held by the District Court, or whether he was acting in a fiduciary capacity, as held by the Circuit Court of Appeals, or whether upon both points, we are unable to ascertain. It is enough, however, for us to say that the denial by the Supreme Court of a writ of certiorari in the case, in view of the ruling sought to be reviewed, is decisive of the point involved in the case we have under consideration, that an indebtedness created by the president of a private corporation, by his misappropriation of the funds of an insolvent private corporation in the payment of a debt due him by the corporation, made pending a suit by a creditor of the corporation against it, is not dischargeable in bankruptcy. It was held in Re Gulick, 186 Fed. 350, by the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, that officers of a private corporation, where they get control, with an attendant fiduciary obligation, of the property of the corporation, are "officers," within the meaning of section 17a (4) of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898, exempting from discharge debts created by his misappropriation or defalcation while acting as an "officer." The ruling was based on the reasoning of Judge McDowell in Re Harper (D. C.) 133 Fed. 970. Under the admissions contained in the defendant's answer, and in view of the principles announced in the authorities cited to the second headnote, the defendant, by applying the proceeds of sale to the payment of debts in the interest of himself, to the exclusion of the plaintiff, misappropriated the funds which were in his hands and held for the benefit of creditors.

Judgment affirmed.

WESTBERRY v. CLANTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 22, 1911.)

1. ARREST (§ 63*)—WARRANT—NECESSITY—COMMON-LAW RULE.

At common law a public officer could not lawfully arrest without a warrant for an offense not a felony, when not committed in his presence, except as provided by St. Winchester, c. 4, an arrest of any suspicious nightwalker might be made by watchmen; or a justice of the peace, by word of mouth, might authorize the arrest of one engaged in a riot not in the presence of the justice. 4 Bl. Com. *292; 2 Hawk. P. C. 127 et seq.; 2 Hale's P. C. 85, 86, 98; 2 Addison on Torts, § 802. See Porter v. State, 124 Ga. 297, 301, 52 S. E. 283, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 80*)—PRESUMPTIONS—LAWS OF OTHER STATES—COMMON LAW.

The contrary not appearing, it will be presumed that the common law exists in the state of Alabama (Wells v. Gress, 118 Ga. 566 (2), 557, 45 S. E. 418), and therefore that a public officer in that state is not authorized to make an arrest without a warrant for a misdemeanor not committed in his presence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 80; * Common Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-16.]

3. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 2*)—ELEMENTS—COMMON LAW—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

False imprisonment at common law and elsewhere consists in the unlawful detention of the person of another for any length of time, whereby he is deprived of his personal liberty (3 Bl. Com. *127; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 721; 19 Cyc. 319; Civ. Code 1910, § 4447, which is a codification of the common law), and furnishes a right of action for damages to the person so detained. The only essential elements of the action being the detention and its unlawfulness (3 Bl. Com. *127), malice and the want of probable cause need not be shown (Chivers v. Savage, 85 Eng. Com. Law R. 696; Brandt v. Craddock, 27 L. J. (N. S.) 314; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 726, citing, among other cases, Rich

v. McInerny, 103 Ala. 345, 15 South. 663, 49 Am. St. Rep. 32).

4. TRIAL (§§ 251, 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Accordingly, where, upon the trial of an action brought in this state, embracing several counts, one of which was for false imprisonment, it appeared that the plaintiff was arrested and imprisoned in the state of Alabama by a police officer of a city of that state, by virtue of a telegram sent to him, at the instance of the defendant, by a sheriff of this state, the defendant writing the telegram and by authority of the sheriff signing the latter's name thereto, the defendant having previously had a warrant issued in this state, charging the plaintiff with having committed in this state "the offense of a misdemeanor," it was error for the court to give the jury the following instructions: (a) "If the imprisonment is by virtue of a warrant, the party bona fide suing it out is not guilty of a false imprisonment." (b) And, in general terms, without confining the instruction to the counts other than that for false imprisonment, that the plaintiff must show by a preponderance of the evidence "that the defendant acted in the matters complained of with malice and without probable cause. Those two ingredients must occur before he can recover." There was no evidence to authorize instruction "a." The imprisonment was by virtue of the telegram, the police officer having no warrant, and the warrant in the hands of the sheriff in this state had no force in Alabama. Scott v. Eldridge, 154 Mass. 25, 27 N. E. 677, 12 L. R. A. 379; Simmons v. Vandyke, 138 Ind. 380, 37 N. E. 973, 26 L. R. A. 33, 46 Am. St. Rep. 411; Ounningham v. Baker, 104 Ala. 160, 16 South. 68, 53 Am. St. Rep. 27; State v. Shelton, 79 N. C. 605; Malcomson v. Scott, 56 Mich. 459, 23 N. W. 166; Harris v. Louisville, etc. (C. C.) 35 Fed. 116; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 882; 5 Enc. L. & P. 477 et seq. Instruction "b" was error, because, to sustain the count for false imprisonment, as above shown, it was not necessary to prove malice and want of probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. §§ 251, 252.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 196*)—INSTRUCTIONS—POLICY OF LAW.

The court should not have instructed the jury " * * * that it is the policy of the law, as well as the policy of the courts, that these actions should be strictly guarded. Circumstances under which they are maintained must be accurately stated, and are never encouraged, except in plain cases." While similar language has been used by justices in delivering opinions of this court (Ventress v. Rosser, 73 Ga. 534, 541; Joiner v. Ocean Steamship Co., 86 Ga. 238, 245, 12 S. E. 361), trial judges should not employ it in instructing juries as to the law of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

6. OTHER GROUNDS NOT REVIEWED.

In view of the rulings above stated, and the fact that a new trial must be had, it is not necessary to pass on the other grounds of the motion for a new trial.

ROBERTS v. MOORE

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 139*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for the recovery of land, it was not error to permit a witness to testify to the effect that two persons under whom the plaintiff and the defendant respectively claimed bought a certain lot of land, one half of which was the subject of the action, and that each of such persons paid for his respective half of the lot which they divided between them, one taking the east half and the other the west, over the objection that the transaction about which the witness testified was one involving the sale of land or an interest therein, and was therefore required to be in writing, and that the writing would be the highest evidence; it also appearing that each purchaser took possession of the land respectively assigned to him in the parol division.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In such an action it was not harmful error to permit a witness to testify to whom a deed was made, where the deed itself was put in evidence and showed that it was made to the person to whom the witness testified it was executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 33*)—PARTIES—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action to which the grantor in a deed is not a party, parol evidence was not admissible to show that the instrument, while purporting to convey an entire lot of land, was intended by the parties thereto to convey only the west half of the lot, and that by mistake of the scrivener the entire lot was inserted. This is true, although the defendant in the action set up such mistake in his plea, and asked that the deed be accordingly reformed. The grantor not being a party to the action, such plea was not good in law. Wyche v. Green, 32 Ga. 341; Brown v. Brown, 97 Ga. 531, 25 S. E. 353, 33 L. R. A. 816; Hamilton v. Cargile, 127 Ga. 762, 56 S. E. 1022; Halliday v. Bank of Stewart County, 128 Ga. 639, 58 S. E. 169; 34 Cyc. 987; 18 Enc. P. & P. 795.

(a) The grantor named in the deed which was sought to be reformed not being a party to the suit, it was error to charge on the law of mutual mistake and reformation of deeds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 122-139; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 472*)—OPINION—STATEMENT OF FACTS.

The bare statement of a witness that he used no fraud or deception to induce the grantors to sign a designated deed was not admissible in evidence, as it amounted to a mere conclusion of the witness. The facts and circumstances attending the signing should have been stated, so that the jury could reach their own conclusion as to whether or not any fraud or deception was used by the witness to induce the grantors to sign the instrument. See, in this connection, Mayor, etc., of Milledgeville v. Wood, 114 Ga. 370, 40 S. E. 239.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2186-2195; Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 193*) — INSTRUCTIONS — OPINION OF JUDGE.

This being an action of complaint for land, where the plaintiff alleged that the defendant was in possession of the land in dispute, and the defendant filed his plea setting up title by prescription by adverse possession under color of title, the judge did not express an unauthorized opinion as to the facts of the case, when in beginning his instructions to the jury he stated that the case was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant "in the possession of the east half"; nor, while setting forth the contentions of the defendant, in stating that "the defendant sets up a title by prescription and color of title."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 436-438; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

6. CHARGE OF COURT—PRESCRIPTION.

There was not sufficient evidence of possession by defendant, or those under whom he claimed, to authorize a charge on the subject of prescription.

7. ARGUMENTATIVE CHARGE.

An assignment of error that the whole charge was argumentative was without merit.

Where a writing purporting to be the last will and testament of a testator is probated and admitted to record, notwithstanding its defective execution as a will, and an heir of the decedent accepts from the executor possession of land therein devised to him treating the same as his own, such devisee, after the lapse of a great length of time, and without offering to restore the property to the estate, will be estopped from denying the validity of the paper as a will, or questioning the jurisdiction of the court admitting it to probate.

Action by W. T. Lester against O. O. Banks Bros. and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Hines & Vinson, for plaintiffs in error. Allen & Pottle, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This is an action of complaint for land by W. T. Lester against O. O. Banks Bros. and L. A. Collette. The plaintiff claimed a one-fifth undivided interest in the premises sued for. He attached to his declaration the following abstract of title: "(1) Death of W. W. Lester, grandfather of petitioner, in possession of said premises in 1872. (2) Setting apart of the tract of land described in the within petition as a homestead of Sarah A. Lester, widow of W. W. Lester, and her three minor children, to wit, William T. Lester, John Dennis Lester, and Emma Lester. (3) Death of William T. Lester, leaving as his sole heir at law W. T. Lester, the petitioner. (4) Death of John Dennis Lester and Emma Lester, leaving no heirs at law. (5) At the date of the death of Sarah A. Lester and the maturity of Wm. T. Lester, John Dennis Lester, and Emma Lester, being the date at which the homestead estate was determined, there remained surviving of all the children of W. W. Lester and Sarah A. Lester, Wm. T. Lester, John Dennis Lester, Emma Lester, L. L. Lester, Kit Lester, Virginia Lester, Mrs. Tobe Thompson, and Mrs. Tom Butts." The defendant filed a plea admitting his possession, but denying that the plaintiff had any title to the land. He offered to amend by alleging that in 1869 the common grantor, William Lester, executed a writing purporting to be a will, which writing devised to Sarah A. Lester, his wife, for life, with remainder over to Virginia, Emma and John D. Lester, the land described in the petition; that the will was attested by two witnesses, and was probated in common form and admitted to record as the last will and testament of Wil-

Ham W. Lester, and that letters testamentary were issued to denominated executors; that the widow and all of the heirs at law of William W. Lester treated the writing herein described as the true, legal, and valid will of William W. Lester, and all their acts and conduct affecting the property therein devised have been performed with reference to, and in conformity with, the writing; that W. T. Lester (father of the plaintiff) accepted the devise to him of certain lands located in Early (now Miller) county, and entered into possession of the same. Wherefore, defendants say that this conduct on the part of W. T. Lester operates to estop him from disputing the validity of the will, and, further, that the writing proved as a will is good color of title. This amendment was disallowed by the court. The case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for a one-seventh undivided interest in the premises and certain mesne profits. A motion for new trial was denied, and the defendants estopped.

The paper admitted to record as the will of W. W. Lester was attested by only two witnesses. A will attested by only two witnesses is void, and can derive no aid from probate and being admitted to record. Cureton v. Taylor, 89 Ga. 490, 15 S. E. 643. The defense set up in the amendment is, not that the defendants obtained title under the will, but that their grantors and the plaintiff's father were devisees under this instrument which was probated as the last will and testament of W. W. Lester, and that the plaintiff's father could not enter into possession and appropriate to his own use the land devised to him and repudiate the devise made to the defendants' grantors. In the language of the old Scotch law, one cannot both approbate and reprobate. The plaintiff's father received the Miller county land as a devise under the will of his father; and he will not be permitted to assert that the will was legally executed to the extent of conveying his title, but not so as to the other devisees. The invalidity of the will because of defective attestation does not forbid the application of the doctrine of estoppel. It is the conduct of a party taking a benefit which he could not otherwise have but for the invalid will which will estop him from setting up the invalidity of the will to defeat the other devisees. If a will defectively executed has been probated by agreement of the heirs, who are sui juris, and the property distributed by virtue of the will, an heir will not be heard in disavowance of the title to the property therein devised. Gay v. Sanders, 101 Ga. 601, 28 S. E. 1019. In Branson v. Watkins, 96 Ga. 54, 23 S. E. 204, a will attested by two witnesses was probated to record. One of the devisees accepted a devise of land thereunder; and the court said: "The conduct of [this devisee] amounted to an election to take under the will; and after remaining for more than 30 years in possession of the land received from the executors, accepting and acquiescing in the validity of the probate proceedings whereby the paper had been adjudged to be the true last will of the alleged testator, and claiming thereunder a life estate only, she would have been estopped from denying the validity of the paper as a will or questioning the jurisdiction of the court admitting it to probate or the regularity of the probate proceedings." We think the principle ruled in the case last cited controls the legal proposition presented in the amendment. As neither the original plea nor the amendment averred any adverse possession in the defendants or their predecessors in title for the prescriptive period, we forbear ruling on the purely academic question of whether a defectively attested will, when probated and admitted to record, may suffice for color of title.

All of the assignments of error in the amended motion are expressly abandoned, except the last, which is so insufficiently stated that no precise legal question is presented.

For the reason that the court deprived the defendants of a substantial defense by disallowing their amendment, a new trial is granted.

Judgment reversed.

RUCKER v. RUCKER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 23, 1911.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 273*)—DECLARATIONS—TITLE TO PROPERTY.

Declarations of a person in possession of property, in favor of his own title, are admissible to prove his adverse possession, but for no other purpose. Civil Code 1910, § 5767; Dawson v. Callaway, 18 Ga. 573; Hansell v. Bryan, 19 Ga. 167; Harrison v. Hatcher, 44 Ga. 638 (4); Bowman v. Owens, 133 Ga. 49, 65 S. E. 156.

Accordingly, the declarations of such person that the property had been given to him by another are not admissible for the purpose of proving the gift.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1108-1120; Dec. Dig. § 273; Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 670.]

2. TRIAL (§ 252*)—ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 60*)—HOSTILE CHARACTER OF POSSESSION—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Permissive possession cannot be the foundation of a prescription until an adverse claim and actual notice to the other party. Civil Code 1910, § 4164. Where possession is inceptively permissive, title by prescription under 20 years' possession will not ripen until the expiration of 20 years after actual notice to the party under whom possession originated of the adverse claim of the one setting up prescription. Therefore, where the defendant relied on adverse possession for a period of 20 years for the establishment of a prescriptive title to a part of the land in controversy, and introduced evidence tending to show possession for the requisite time, but the evidence disclosed that the possession originated by permission of the plaintiff, and there was no evidence tending to show 20 years' possession after actual notice to the plaintiff of the defendant's adverse claim, a charge on the subject of title by prescription under 20 years' adverse possession was not authorized by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252;* Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 60*) — HOSTILE CHARACTER OF POSSESSION—INSTRUCTION.

The evidence set out in the sixth ground of the motion for a new trial, relating to the adverse possession of the defendant to part of the land in controversy, was admissible; but, in the absence of any evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had actual notice of the adverse character of such possession for 20 years prior to the bringing of the action, the evidence was not sufficient to show title by prescription in the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 282-314; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

Where a person applied for and obtained admission to the bar of this state as an attorney in good standing in another state, under Civil Code 1895, § 4411 (Civil Code 1910, § 4949), without disclosing the fact that shortly theretofore he had been disbarred for professional misconduct and acts involving moral turpitude by a court of competent jurisdiction in another state where he was located before going to that whence he came to Georgia, this was such a fraud and imposition upon the court of this state as authorized the disbarment of such attorney upon its discovery. On the general subject, see In re Pritchett, 122 App. Div. 8, 106 N. Y. Supp. 847; In re Marx, 115 App. Div. 448, 101 N. Y. Supp. 680; People v. Ed. 798; Weeks on Attorneys at Law, § 80, p. 153.

(a) Accordingly, on the trial of a disbarment proceeding against an attorney at law in this state, in the court which admitted him and in the county of his residence, before the judge who by consent passed upon the law and facts without the intervention of a jury, where the pleadings and evidence were of such character as to authorize a finding that on the 21st day of February, 1906, the respondent, being then an attorney at law in the state of Illinois, by judgment of the Supreme Court of that state, having jurisdiction in such matters, based on charges involving professional misconduct and moral turpitude, was disbarred from pleading and practicing law in any of the courts of that state, and thereafter became a resident of Tennessee, and in January, 1907, after examination under the laws of Tennessee, obtained a license to plead and practice law in that state, without informing the court so admitting him of his previous disbarment in Illinois, and in July, 1907, became a resident of Georgia, and on the 5th day of October, 1907, upon his application representing that he was an attorney at law in good standing in the state of Tennessee, obtained admission to the bar in Georgia, under the provisions of the statute mentioned in the first headnote, without informing the court of the fact of his previous disbarment in the state of Illinois, the judge was authorized to enter a judgment disbarring the respondent and revoking his license as an attorney at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 58; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 53*)—DISBARMENT PROCEEDINGS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In such a proceeding, the respondent in his answer having set up that before the grant of the license to him in Tennessee he informed the officers of court admitting him of his previous disbarment in Illinois, it was not error to admit their testimony tending to disprove that part of the plea over the objections: (a) That it was irrelevant; and (b) that it sought to impeach the judgment of the court of Tennessee which admitted him to plead and practice in that state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 822*) — CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

It is undisputed that the respondent participated in the trial which resulted in his disbarment in Illinois, and that the trial was had in the court having jurisdiction of such matters in that state, and that the judgment has never been set aside. The judgment so rendered was conclusive upon the respondent, and there was no error in rejecting evidence tending to disprove the charges upon which the judgment was based.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 822.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 728*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint in the bill of exceptions that "the respondent offered to testify that the judge ment of the Supreme Court of Illinois disbaring him was obtained by fraud, by a conspiracy upon the part of" certain named persons, and that the judge "rejected the testimony, * * * to which said judgment of the court the respondent then and there excepted and now excepts and assigns error upon the same," is not a sufficient assignment of error. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 180*)—DELAY IN BRINGING SUIT—AGREEMENT AS TO TIME—DEMURRER.

This case is controlled by the decision in McGarry v. Seiz, 129 Ga. 296, 58 S. E. 856. The court did not err in sustaining a general demurrer to the petition.

Evans, P. J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. L. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Mary McGarry and others against E. C. Seiz and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Thos. F. Corrigan and R. B. Blackburn, for plaintiffs in error. Dodd & Dodd, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. The plaintiffs in error filed, in the court below, suit against E. C. Seiz, as principal, and Aetna Indemnity Company, as surety, on a bond given for the faithful performance of a contract for the erection of a dwelling. The suit was instituted to recover from the defendants the amount of a judgment in favor of certain materialmen, obtained by them in a lien foreclosure proceeding against the property of the plaintiffs above referred to, growing out of the erection of the building by the defendant Seiz, and his failure to pay said materialmen's claims. It was alleged that this judgment had been paid off and satisfied by the petitioners. The indemnity company demurred generally to the petition, which demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiffs excepted.

It is contended by the defendants in error that the demurrer was properly sustained, on the ground that the suit was not brought within the time required by the following provision contained in the bond: "If any suits at law or proceedings in equity are brought against said surety to recover any claim hereunder, the same must be instituted within six months after the completion of the work specified in said contract." It is evident from the allegations of the petition that this suit was not instituted within the time stipulated in the foregoing clause of the bond.

On the other hand, it is contended by the plaintiffs in error that, since materialmen have 12 months from the time their claim becomes due in which to commence a proceeding to foreclose the same, the foregoing clause of the bond is at variance and irreconcilable with the following clause contained therein, to wit: "The surety shall not be liable under this bond to any except the obligee, but it is agreed that the obligee, in estimating his damage, may include the claims of mechanics and materialmen, arising out of the performance of the contract, and paid by him, only when the same, by the statutes of the state where the contract is to be performed, are valid liens against the property."

A former suit, instituted by the same plaintiffs against these defendants to recover the amount claimed by the same materialmen whose judgment is referred to in the present suit, and who were then proceeding to foreclose the same, was dismissed by this court, on the ground that the same was prematurely brought; it appearing from the petition in that case that the liens so set up had not been paid by the plaintiffs; and it not being alleged that the same were valid liens. The decision in that case is reported in 129 Ga. 296, 58 S. E. 856. It was then contended by counsel for Mrs. McGarry that she must have the right to bring her suit within the six months, notwithstanding no payment had been made to the materialmen. On this question Justice Cobb, speaking for the court said: "She has entered into a contract by which she agrees that the surety will not be liable to her, unless her claim for damages is asserted by suit within six months from the time the work is completed. She has also entered into a contract that the surety will not be liable on account of the claims of materialmen, unless such claims are valid liens under the laws of the state. She must be held to the terms of her contract; there being nothing in the undertakings therein which would be contrary to public policy. The surety had a right to contract with her that its liability should be subject to reasonable conditions, and the conditions above referred to are not, in any sense, unreasonable as to the character of the claim for which the surety should be liable, or the time in which the suit should be brought. See, in this connection, Massachusetts Life Ass'n v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 272, 30 S. E. 918, 42 L. R. A. 261, and citations. In order to hold the surety liable, she must determine, at her peril, whether the claim of the materialmen, asserted against her, constituted a valid lien under the laws of this state. If it does, she may pay the same, and bring suit for indemnity within six months from the time the work is completed. If it does not, she may decline to pay the same and defend against such claim. There is nothing in the terms of the contract which, either expressly or impliedly, provides that the validity of the lien shall be first determined by a judgment of the courts. If she paid the claim, and it thereafter developed that the same was not a valid lien under the laws of the state, there is no liability under the bond. If she paid the claim, and it was a valid lien under the laws of the state, the surety would be liable, provided the other conditions of the bond are complied with, and suit to recover the amount so paid is filed within six months from the time that the work is completed."

This case is controlled by the ruling above quoted; and under that ruling the petition now before us was properly dismissed on demurrer, because the same was not filed within the time required by the terms of the bond.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except EVANS, P. J., dissenting.

1. LIS PENDENS (§ 25*)—ACTION RELATING TO LAND—PERSONS BOUND BY JUDGMENT—"NOTICE."

A suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land is "notice" of the claim that the plaintiff sets up therein from the time it is commenced and docketed; and, if duly prosecuted and not collusive, one purchasing the land pending the suit is affected by the final decree rendered therein, though the suit is in a county other than the one in which the land is located.

2. VENUE (§ 5*)—"RESPECTING TITLES TO LAND."

A suit for specific performance is not a suit "respecting titles to land," within Const. art. 6, § 16, par. 2, requiring cases of that nature to be tried in the county where the land lies.

Error from Superior Court, Upson County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by G. P. Marshall against H. T. Whatley and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Claude Worrill and E. C. Armistead, for plaintiff in error. J. Y. Allen, W. Y. Allen, and E. F. Dupree, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. G. P. Marshall, plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the plaintiff), brought suit in April, 1907, to recover a described tract of land, against H. P. Whatley and others. All the defendants in the suit, except H. T. Whatley (hereinafter called the defendant), disclaimed title and any right of possession. Upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the court granted a nonsuit, and he excepted. The plaintiff claimed to have entered into possession of the land and made valuable improvements thereon, under a written contract for its purchase from J. A. Carmichael, Jr., to whom he paid all of the purchase-money, but who would not make him a deed. He filed a petition, in Pike superior court, for specific performance of the contract and an injunction against the sale of the land by Carmichael. Upon this petition, on the day it was filed, a restraining order was granted, which seems never to have been revoked or modified. Upon the trial a verdict and decree were rendered in favor of the plaintiff, requiring Carmichael to make the plaintiff a deed to the land, which was located in Upson county. Counsel for the defendant contends that the record shows that the defendant bought the land from C. S. Barrett, and that Barrett bought from Carmichael, and that if the plaintiff had any title to or interest in the land when he purchased, neither of them, when they respectively purchased the land, had any notice of such title or interest. The plaintiff contends that the record shows that Barrett bought from Carmichael, and defendant bought from Barrett after plaintiff made his written contract with Carmichael for the purchase of the land, and that each, when they respectively purchased, had equal notice of the fact that the plaintiff had such written contract. The plaintiff further contends that the purchases by Barrett and the defendant were made pending the suit of the plaintiff against Carmichael for specific performance; and though this suit was in the superior court of Pike county, and the land was located in Upson county, it was notice to any one buying from Carmichael, pending the suit, of the plaintiff's claim therein, and of the verdict and decree rendered therein.

[1] 1. We think the record sufficient to authorize a finding that when Barrett bought the land from Carmichael, and when the defendant bought it from Barrett, the suit by the plaintiff against Carmichael for specific performance was pending. The plaintiff testified, among other things, to substantially the following: He made a contract with Carmichael for the purchase of the land in 1899, and went into possession in the spring of 1899. He built a house and made other improvements. He locked the house, in which were some sawmill tools, and left the land in the spring of 1902. The defendant states, in the amendment to his plea, that "it was after plaintiff had declared he had given it up and moved off that Barrett purchased." According to the evidence, the plaintiff "moved off" in the spring of 1902, and the suit for specific performance was filed March 15, 1902. The defendant does not expressly state that either of the purchases, the one by him from Barrett, or the one by Barrett from Carmichael, was not made pending the suit for specific performance, but alleges that this suit in the superior court of Pike county was not notice to one buying, pending the suit from the defendant in that suit, the land located in Upson county. The suit for specific performance, which was filed March 15, 1902, pending until April 3, 1906, when a verdict and decree were rendered. The plaintiff did not leave the land until the spring of 1902. After that some one broke open the house. The plea alleges that Carmichael was in possession when Barrett bought from him. We think the evidence sufficient to authorize a finding that Barrett bought pending the suit. The plaintiff testified that the defendant bought the land in 1903, which was pending the suit for specific performance. He further testified that "suit was pending in Pike superior court at the time the defendants bought the land here in dispute from J. A. Carmichael, under which they went into possession of it." The Civil Code 1910, § 4533, provides: "Decrees ordinarily bind only parties and their privies; but a pending suit is a general notice of an equity or claim to all the world from the time the petition is filed and docketed; and if the same is duly prosecuted and is not collusive, one who purchases pending the suit is affected by the decree rendered therein." No exception is made with respect to a suit which is pending in a county other than the one wherein the land involved is located. We think that the suit for specific performance by the plaintiff against Carmichael in the superior court of Pike county, which terminated in a verdict and decree in favor of the plaintiff, was notice of the right and claim of the plaintiff to the land, though the land was situated in Upson county. Civil Code 1910, § 5425, provides: "A decree for specific performance shall operate as a deed to convey land or other property without any conveyance being executed by the vendor. Such decree, certified by the clerk, shall be recorded in the registry of deeds in the county where the land lies, and shall stand in the place of a deed." There is no statute in this state (as in some states) providing that in order for suits of this character to be notice there must be filed in the county where the land lies a notice that suit is pending in another county. In the absence of such a statute, a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land against the owner, in a county different from that in which the land lies, is notice of the rights of the plaintiff in that suit, under the section of the Civil Code of 1910, above quoted.

[2] It is true that a suit for specific performance is not a suit "respecting titles to land," within the meaning of the provision of our Constitution (Const. art. 6, § 16, par. 2), requiring a suit of that nature to be brought in the county where the land lies; and that it must be brought in the county of the residence of the defendant, though it be in a county different from that in which the land is located. Yet a suit of this kind is of such a nature, and so far involves the right to the title, use, and enjoyment of the land as to make it notice under the section above quoted. See Faulkner v. Vickers, 94 Ga. 531, 21 S. E. 233. This is true, though the suit is brought in a county other than that in which the land is located. The provision in the Civil Code 1910, § 5425, quoted, supra, that "such decree, certified by the clerk, shall be recorded in the registry of deeds where the land lies, and shall stand in the place of a deed," is a requirement as to what shall be done after the determination of the suit; but we have no statute providing that anything must be done by the plaintiff in a suit for specific performance, in a county other than that in which the land lies, pending such suit, in order to give notice to any one who buys the land involved in the suit from the defendant therein. In 2 Black on Judgments, in the text in section 550, he quotes language appearing in the decision in the case of Brightman v. Brightman, 1 R. I. 112, as follows: "We apprehend it is well settled that he who purchases property pending a suit in which the title to it is involved takes it subject to the judgment or decree that may be passed in such suit against the person from whom he purchases. That he purchased it bona fide and paid a full consideration for it will not avail against such judgment or decree. Nor will he be permitted to prove that he had no notice of the suit. The law infers that all persons have notice of the proceedings of courts of record." See, in this connection, Wickliffe v. Breckinridge, 1 Bush (Ky.) 427.

In the suit for specific performance, the land was described as follows: "Two hundred acres, more or less, being all of lot No. ——— in ——— district of Upson county, Ga., being bounded on the north by the county line and on the east by the lands of Will Daniel, and on the south and west by the lands of Richard Fallens." This description was not so indefinite as to prevent the pendency of the suit from operating as a lis pendens, so as to give notice of the plaintiff's claim made in that suit to the land in controversy. See Johnson v. McKay, 121 Ga. 763, 49 S. E. 757. Judgment reversed.

HELMS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 22, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 649*)—REFUSAL OF CONTINUANCE—GROUNDS.

Where, in the course of a trial, a party desires to impeach a witness by stenographic notes taken on a former trial, which notes are in an adjoining county, it is not an abuse of discretion to refuse to suspend the case until the next day to allow an effort to be made to procure the absent notes; and especially is this so where the court allows the movant to introduce witnesses who deliver testimony in accord with the alleged absent memoranda.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 681*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—PRELIMINARY PROOF.

Relevant evidence dependent for its admissibility upon preliminary proof, which has been allowed without requiring such preliminary proof, should be considered by the jury, and an instruction which in effect withdraws such evidence from the jury is erroneous.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 814, 1172*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO CASE—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where on the trial of a criminal case the accused sought to impeach a witness for the state by proof of a contradictory statement, and the state replied with proof denying that the witness made the statement, and the judge, in charging as to how witnesses may be impeached, read Pen. Code 1910, § 1052, upon the subject, there being no evidence of the good character of any of the witnesses, the last clause of that section, to the effect that a witness, when impeached, may be sustained by proof of general good character, was inapplicable and improperly given in charge; but, under the facts of the case, this was a harmless error.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 825*)—IMPEACHMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court instructs the jury as to the different methods of impeaching a witness and the effect of a successful impeachment, and a party desires an elaboration of the law of impeachment or a concrete application of it, he should make a pertinent and timely written request.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 782*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NEGATIVE AND POSITIVE TESTIMONY.

It is erroneous to charge Pen. Code 1910, § 1011, that "the existence of a fact testified to by one positive witness is rather to be believed than that such fact did not exist because many witnesses who had the same opportunity of observation swear that they did not see or know of its having transpired," without an instruction, in connection therewith, touching the credibility of witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 782.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 828*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—MANSLAUGHTER.

The evidence did not authorize an instruction on the law of voluntary manslaughter. The criticism that the evidence did not authorize certain charges is not well founded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2007; Dec. Dig. § 828.*]

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Lloyd Helms was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

A. S. Thurman, for plaintiff in error. Jos. E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

EVANS, P. J. Lloyd Helms was convicted of the murder of Joe Greer, alias Good Greer, and recommended to the mercy of the court. The state submitted evidence tending to show that Laura Greer, the sister of the deceased, lived in a state of concubinage with the defendant. Between 7 and 8 o'clock at night the defendant came to the house where Laura Greer lived. She was sick, and attended by a small girl, named Lidell Sanders. He demanded, with an oath, that the door be opened, and Laura told Lidell to open the door. The defendant came into the house with his shoes under his arm, and with a knife, and asked if his supper was ready. Upon Laura's giving him an affirmative answer, he said he was going to the spring to get some water, and was going to kill her upon his return. As soon as he left the house, Laura ran to her mother's about a mile or a mile and a half distant. When she reached her mother's house, she cried out for some one to open the door. Her brother, the deceased, replied, "The door is open. Come on in the house. Nobody ain't going to bother you." The mother of Laura asked her if the defendant was pursuing her, and she said yes, that he was going to kill her. When the defendant arrived at the house of the mother of the deceased, he said "he had to have nigger out of there." The mother replied, "There is no need of you carrying on this way. You better go home." And the defendant said, "If she don't come out, I will kill her." The deceased started out of the house, when his mother told him not to go. The deceased replied that he was going out to show the road to the defendant. Neither the mother nor daughter saw the deceased approach the defendant, nor did they see any blow. The deceased was stabbed with a knife. The mother of the deceased called him, and the defendant, who had ran off a short distance, replied, "God damn him, he won't answer you any more, for I have killed him." The homicide occurred in a road about 10 steps from the door of the house. A few hours afterwards a razor, identified as belonging to the deceased, was picked up at the place where the body of the deceased was found.

[1] 1. The case had been tried on a former occasion, and was stenographically reported. The stenographer's notes, which had not been transcribed, were at his home in an adjoining county. When two of the witnesses for the state had testified, counsel for the defendant moved to suspend the trial of the case until he could send to the home of the stenographer for his notes, to be used for the purpose of impeachment. The court refused to suspend the trial, and the defendant introduced witnesses who testified that the two witnesses for the state had testified differently on the former trial. The court is not bound to suspend the trial of a cause to enable the defendant to procure additional evidence. Zipperer v. Mayor & Aldermen of Savannah, 128 Ga. 135, 57 S. E. 311. The defendant knew that the case had been tried on a former occasion, and, if he desired the stenographic report of the case, proper diligence would have demanded that he procure it before the trial.

2. It appeared in evidence that shortly before the homicide the deceased had threatened to kill the defendant, but this threat was not communicated to the defendant prior to the homicide. The court charged the jury that any threat made by the deceased against the defendant should not be considered by the jury unless they believed that the deceased attacked the defendant, or did some overt act showing an intention to carry the threat into execution. Among other criticisms on this charge it is contended that inasmuch as the defendant in his statement declared that the deceased attacked him, and that he inflicted the mortal blow in defense of this attack, and as the evidence of the state was somewhat equivocal as to the motive of the deceased in leaving the house and as to his conduct just before he was stricken, the charge withdrew from the jury any consideration of the uncommunicated threat in determining whether the deceased was actually attacking the defendant when he received his mortal wound.

[2] It is a rule of law that as a preliminary to the admissibility of an uncommunicated threat by the defendant against the deceased it must be shown that the deceased was the assailant in the fatal encounter, or did some overt act showing an intention to carry that threat into execution, and that this preliminary foundation must be made by proof; the defendant's statement being insufficient of itself to supply the foundation. Rouse v. State, 135 Ga. 227, 69 S. E. 180; Pride v. State, 133 Ga. 439, 66 S. E. 259. It would have been sufficient ground for the rejection of evidence of the decedent's uncommunicated threat that the proper foundation had not been laid; yet, where the evidence has been received, the defendant is entitled to have it considered by the jury in all its aspects. Evidence which has no probative value—like hearsay evidence—may be disregarded by the court in his charge; but relevant evidence, the admissibility of which is dependent upon a preliminary showing, is not to be withdrawn from the jury by the court in its charge simply because the proper foundation may not have been laid. Goodwyn v. Goodwyn, 20 Ga. 600; Patton v. Bank of Lafayette, 124 Ga. 974, 53 S. E. 664, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 592. The charge was harmful to the defendant, because of the uncertainty of the decedent's intent and purpose in leaving the house to meet the defendant, as disclosed by the evidence. His mother testified that after Laura Greer had reached her house, and the defendant came up, announcing his purpose "that he had come to kill or get killed or have his negro out of there," she advised the decedent, as he started out of the door, to remain in the house. To this admonition the decedent replied that he was going out to show the road to the defendant. No one observed what actually transpired in the road after the decedent left the house. The evidence makes it apparent that the defendant was familiar with the road; that the house sat within a few feet of the road, with no inclosure. The prior threat of the decedent under these circumstances tended to illustrate the state of mind of the deceased, and whether his declaration that he intended to show the defendant the road meant something other than an expression of an intended friendly courtesy. Vaughn v. State, 88 Ga. 731, 16 S. E. 64.

[3] 3. The accused offered evidence tending to show that two of the state's witnesses have testified differently on a former trial. The state offered evidence tending to show that their testimony on the present trial was in harmony with that delivered by them on the former trial. In his charge the court read Pen. Code 1910, § 1052, which provides how a witness may be impeached by contradictory statements previously made, where the proper foundation has been laid. He read the entire section of the Code, the last sentence of which is as follows: "When thus impeached he may be sustained by proof of general good character, the effect of the evidence to be determined by the jury." Error is assigned upon the reading of this Code section in its entirety, because there was no attempt to sustain the witness by proof of general good character. We do not think this is sufficient ground for a new trial. The state did not attempt to establish the credibility of the witnesses by proof of good character, and the reading of the entire Code section under the facts of this case is not reversible error. Kelly v. State, 118 Ga. 329, 45 S. E. 413.

[4] 4. The court charged the jury concerning the different methods of impeaching a witness and the effect of a successful impeachment. Complaint is made that the court failed to further elaborate the law of impeachment, and apply its principles in the concrete to the case. The court's failure in this respect, in the absence of a pertinent and timely written request, is not ground for a new trial. Perdue v. State, 135 Ga. 277, 69 S. E. 184.

[5] 5. The court read several sections of the Penal Code respecting the character and degree of strength of the evidence required for a conviction in criminal cases. He also read section 1011 (quoted in the 5th head-note). Error is assigned upon the reading of this section without further stating in connection therewith that the rule applies only where the witnesses are of equal credibility. Whenever the judge deems it proper to give this section of the Code in charge, he should accompany it by an additional charge touching the credibility of witnesses. Warwick v. State, 125 Ga. 133, 53 S. E. 1027. And, where he fails so to do, a new trial will ordinarily be granted, unless it appears that the failure in this respect was not calculated to harm the complaining party. While, under the facts of this case, the error may not have been so harmful to the defendant as to require a new trial, yet attention is called to it that it may be avoided on the next trial.

[8] 6. There is nothing in the evidence authorizing a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter. If that grade of homicide was involved, it was founded solely on the statement of the accused; and, there being no timely written request to charge upon the subject of manslaughter, there was no error in the failure to do so. Cook v. State, 134 Ga. 348, 67 S. E. 812. The criticism that the evidence did not authorize an instruction upon certain propositions is not well founded.

Judgment reversed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 954*)—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT OF GROUNDS.

A ground of a motion for new trial should be complete in itself; and nothing is presented for decision by a ground which complains that the court erred in refusing to permit a named witness to be questioned by the defendant's attorney as to what the witness swore on the commitment trial, and also that the court refused to permit the attorney to ask the witness if she did not swear "certain things" on such trial which were contradictory to what "she now swears," such examination of the witness being relied on to show that defendant's counsel had been entrapped by said witness "in having sworn differently at the said commitment trial to what she now swears; the attorney having stated that he had been entrapped by said witness."

2. INSTRUCTIONS—THREATS.

The charge on the subject of threats was not error on the ground that "it is not law, and also gives undue stress to threats, and is calculated to affect the minds of the jury against the defendant."

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1129*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

The court did not instruct the jury upon the law of circumstantial evidence; and an assignment of error upon an extract from the charge which complained that it was an instruction upon the subject of circumstantial evidence, and that there was no evidence to authorize it, was without merit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1129.*]

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Butts County; R. T. Daniel, Judge.

Dallas Barber was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

H. M. Fletcher and O. M. Duke, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Wise, Sol. Gen., and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

ATKINSON, J. Judgment affirmed.

GEORGIA RY. & ELECTRIC CO. v. WHITE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 281*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The verdict was contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it, and a new trial should have been granted on that ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 281.*]

2. DEMURRER TO PETITION.

There was no error in overruling the general demurrer to the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by R. W. White against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Colquitt & Conyers, for plaintiff in error. Jas. L. Key, Reuben R. Arnold, and Lamar Hill, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. R. W. White brought suit against the plaintiff in error to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him on October 4, 1906. The plaintiff alleged that on the date named he was in the employment of the defendant company as conductor; that he had never practiced as motorman, and was not skilled in the operation of a motor or well acquainted with the method of operating the same; that a car was due to leave Atlanta at 1:45 in the morning, which went out Decatur street and out to the Soldiers' Home junction; that there was no motorman to run the car, and the plaintiff was ordered by one of defendant's agents, acting with authority of superintendent, to run said car both as motorman and conductor; that plaintiff had never been warned of the perils of running a car as motorman, nor been given sufficient opportunity or practice to run a car with skill as motorman, or to know or understand the speed of a car; that while proceeding out Decatur street, at the rate of five or six miles an hour, plaintiff reached a switch or turnout from the Decatur street track at the intersection of Piedmont avenue; that this Piedmont avenue track is not a track used by regularly scheduled cars, but used at irregular intervals, and by construction cars mostly, going to defendant's power house to load or unload equipment, and the like; that, under the defendant's practice and custom, the switch at the intersecting turnout at Piedmont avenue was not one which motormen running on the Decatur street main line were required to stop and turn before proceeding, but was one which, being required to remain turned to the main line, motormen could run over upon the assumption that the same was always turned to the main line; that upon the occasion and night in question a car of the defendant in charge of defendant's employes had used said switch in going into said turnout, but had negligently failed to turn the same back to the main line, and, when the same was left open, it was a dangerous obstruction to cars coming down Decatur street; that the defendant was negligent in the construction and maintenance of said switch, in that the same should have been equipped with a block of rubber or other substance, which would keep the switch automatically turned to the main line when not in use, it being alleged that rubber blocks and electrical automatic contrivances were in common use in keeping switches turned, and that ordinary care required the use of same, which, after said switch is turned or used, would automatically throw it back to the main line. It was alleged that while the plaintiff was so proceeding with the car out Decatur street the car struck said open switch, this condition being unknown and invisible to plaintiff in the exercise of ordinary care, and that the car was suddenly turned from the main line track into the Piedmont avenue track, throwing him off the platform of the car upon the ground, seriously and permanently injuring him.

The defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, and defendant excepted. Upon a trial of the case a verdict was rendered against the defendant; the court having overruled a motion for a nonsuit, made at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. A new trial must be granted in this case, on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it. The testimony of the plaintiff himself shows that he voluntarily undertook in the capacity of motorman to run the car from which he was thrown out Decatur street to the point to which it was destined on that particular run. He was at that time in the employment of the defendant company as a conductor, but he had had sufficient experience as a motorman to enable him in that capacity to operate the car. The plaintiff himself testified: "I went the regular schedule for the crew. Yes, sir; I took that car to run it as motorman that night. Yes, sir; they waited until he could see if he was going to come, and he didn't come—that is, waited for the motorman to come. I reckon we waited 15 or 20 minutes. * * * He asked me, and I told him I didn't see nothing of him. After waiting about 15 minutes, I went and told him that the motorman hadn't come. He asked me could I run the car, and I told him I thought I could run it. No; I didn't ask him to let me go and run it. He just said to go ahead and take the car. What I told him was, 'I think I can run the car,' wasn't nothing much said about it, just told him that he hadn't come, and the boys wanted to go home, and he asked me if I had a motorman to carry it out. Yes, sir; I told him I thought I could run a car, and he told me all right, to go ahead and run it. That's just about all that was said. * * * I told the man down there that I could run the car all right." It also appeared from the plaintiff's testimony that he was familiar with the route over the Decatur street line and over the switch at which he was hurled from the car. He had passed over that switch many times. He knew the character of the switch and its exact location. It is true that during the week or so when he ran over the line passing the particular switch in question he had not seen motormen stop the car for the purpose of adjusting the switch; but that fact does not negative the other fact—of his knowledge as to the location and character of the switch. The switch was not unusual in its character. It was of a kind with the other switches on the lines upon which the plaintiff had run as a conductor for a year or more, being one that was adjusted by a switch stick. On the lines with which the plaintiff was familiar there were but few, if any, automatic switches or switches fitted with a rubber block. The plaintiff further testified: "I did not know any rule with reference to whether any switch at Decatur and Piedmont [the point at which the switch in question was located] was to be open or shut. I didn't know any of the motorman's rules. I know nothing about whether that switch was to be open or closed, and nothing about the switch at the corner of Piedmont avenue and Decatur street [the switch last above referred to]. I don't know whether that was to be open or closed, nor how that switch was to be left, or how it was. I knew there was a switch there. I knew there was a track down there. I started my car a block back from that thing. I just started up there, and, without decreasing my speed any, ran it on down as far as the switch, and then ran it into the switch, and it threw me out. I knew no rule with reference to that switch." It was also in the testimony given by a witness for plaintiff that "those switches like that one down there on Piedmont avenue could be used with the application of very little force and exchanged from one line to the other with the switch stick. They were moved frequently by other force than the switch stick. They were moved by wagons. A wagon comes down the rail and the wheel strikes the switch tongue, and throws it over. If a wagon does that running down there, down the curve of the switch, and turns it the wrong way, and a motorman approaches it, he stops and throws it the right way, the same as if another car had used it and left it in that condition. That is not an extremely rare thing where wagons do that. That is pretty often. * * * If there had been a rubber in it, the wagon couldn't have turned it."

When it is remembered that the plaintiff himself was in sole and complete control of the car, that he was running it over a track with which he was familiar, over a switch of which he knew the character and location, that he ran his car, without decreasing his speed, into this switch, there can be but one conclusion reached, and that is that the plaintiff himself by a failure to exercise due care and caution brought upon himself the injury of which he now complains, but of which he has no ground of complaint as against the defendant company. There are other facts in the record strongly tending to show that the plaintiff himself was grossly negligent in running into the open switch, but we have stated only those facts which are uncontroverted and came from the plaintiff or his own witnesses; and under them the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and the court erred in not granting a new trial upon that ground. Having so held, it is unnecessary to deal with the special assignments of error contained in the motion for a new trial.

2. There was no error in overruling the general demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

DUKE v. KELLY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 23, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 613*)—DISMISSAL—DELAY IN CERTIFYING BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where a bill of exceptions on October 19, 1909, was presented to the judge, who held the same for examination until December 14, 1910, before certifying it, and counsel for the plaintiff in error in the meantime made no effort to obtain a mandamus to compel the judge sooner to certify the bill of exceptions, the writ of error will be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2702-2707; Dec. Dig. § 613.*]

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Action between Mrs. M. L. Duke and W. P. Kelly. From the judgment, Duke brings error. Dismissed.

J. S. James, for plaintiff in error. Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson and Geo. P. Whitman, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. In this case the bill of exceptions was presented to the presiding judge on October 19, 1909, and the certificate thereto was signed December 14, 1910. The certificate recites that the bill of exceptions was presented in time and was "held for consideration." Below the certificate is a statement signed by the judge as follows: "Rec'd Oct. 19th, 1909, and held for examination." No application was made to this court to require the judge to certify the bill of exceptions. Civ. Code 1910, § 6158, provides: "If the judge shall determine that the bill of exceptions is not true, or does not contain all the necessary facts, he shall return the same, within ten days, to the party or his attorney, with his objections to the same in writing. If those objections are met and removed, the judge may then certify, specifying in his certificate the cause of the delay. If the judge sees proper, he may order notice to the opposite party of the fact and time of tendering the exceptions, and may hear evidence as to the truth thereof." When the bill of exceptions was presented to the judge, he kept it for "examination" and "consideration." It was not returned to counsel for the plaintiff in error because it was not true, or did not contain "all the necessary facts." When the bill of exceptions was presented to the judge, within 10 days thereafter he should have certified it or returned it to counsel for the plaintiff in error under the provisions of the section above quoted. The failure of the judge, however, to certify the bill of exceptions within 10 days from the time it was presented to him would not work a dismissal of the writ of error, unless the failure to certify the bill of exceptions within the 10 days "was caused by some act of the plaintiff in error or his counsel." Under the act of 1896, embodied in Civ. Code 1910, § 6187, it is provided: "No bill of exceptions shall be dismissed upon the ground that the same was not certified by the judge in the time required by law for tendering and signing bills of exceptions; but if it shall appear from the bill of exceptions that the same was tendered to the judge within the time required by law, a mere failure on his part to sign the same within the time prescribed shall be no cause for dismissal, unless it should appear that the failure to sign and certify the same by the presiding judge within the time prescribed by law was caused by some act of the plaintiff in error or his counsel." This section only provides that a bill of exceptions shall not be dismissed for failure of the judge to certify it within 10 days from the time it is presented, unless such failure "was caused by some act of the plaintiff in error or his counsel." We think the bill of exceptions will have to be dismissed—not because of the failure of the judge to certify it within 10 days, but for other reasons hereinafter stated.

Civ. Code 1910, § 6159, provides: "If from any cause the bill of exceptions is not certified by the judge, without fault of the party tendering, such party or his attorney shall apply at the next term of the Supreme Court, and, on petition, obtain from said court a mandamus nisi directed to such judge." We do not think section 6187, hereinbefore quoted, prohibits a dismissal when the bill of exceptions is held by the judge, with the express or tacit acquiescence of the plaintiff in error, for a long period after the expiration of the 10 days without being certified. This section should be construed in connection with other sections of the Code. So construed, it was not the legislative intent that a plaintiff in error or his counsel upon tendering a bill of exceptions should remain inactive for an indefinite length of time, and permit the judge to hold the bill of exceptions without any action upon it. If the act of 1896 should be so construed, the judge might overlook the bill of exceptions or lay it aside, and let years pass before taking action upon it. In the meantime the defendant in error would remain in a state of uncertainty, and his rights and rights of property might have a cloud cast upon them by reason of the tendering and retention of an inchoate bill of exceptions. While the act of 1896 prohibited the dismissal of a bill of exceptions because the judge after receiving it in due time did not certify it within the time prescribed by law, yet it did not entirely relieve the plaintiff in error or his counsel from any diligence in regard to the matter, or permit them to sit by indefinitely in a state of quiescence, or acquiescence, in the delay of the judge and allow many months, including an entire term of this court, to pass without any effort to compel the judge to act upon the bill of exceptions and thus advance the prosecution of the writ of error. The bill of exceptions in this case was held by the judge for nearly 14 months after being presented to him and then certified. If the judge did not thus hold it without certifying it with the express consent of counsel for the plaintiff in error, it was certainly with their tacit acquiescence. The retention by the judge of the bill of exceptions without certifying it for nearly 14 months after it was presented to him was certainly done with the knowledge of counsel for the plaintiff in error. He had his remedy under the sections above quoted to compel the judge by mandamus from this court to certify the bill of exceptions, which appears to be true and to contain all the necessary facts. His failure to use this remedy to compel the judge to certify the bill of exceptions during the long time the latter held it shows acquiescence by such counsel in the judge thus holding the bill of exceptions without certifying it, and is such neglect on the part of such counsel as makes it necessary to dismiss the writ of error. The bill of exceptions was presented to the judge on October 19, 1909, and should have reached the March term, 1910, of this court. The bill of exceptions was presented to the judge in less than three weeks after the October term, 1909, of this court began, and the plaintiff in error allowed the remainder of that term and the whole of the March term, 1910, to pass without any effort to obtain a mandamus from this court to compel the judge to certify the bill of exceptions, and the bill of exceptions was not certified until several months after the October term, 1910, of this court began.

Writ of error dismissed.

CLARK, County Treasurer, v. BLACK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. STATUTES (§ 124*)—SUBJECT AND TITLE—ESTABLISHMENT OF COURTS.

Where the title of an act provides for the establishment of a court, the appointment of a judge and a solicitor, and the definition of their powers and duties, a provision in the body of the act fixing the fees of the solicitor and the mode of their payment is germane to the general object of the act, and does not offend the constitutional inhibition against the enactment of a law containing matter different from what is expressed in the title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 184-186; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. COURTS (§ 160*)—ESTABLISHMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The General Assembly is expressly empowered to establish such courts as in its wisdom it may deem proper. In the establishment of a city court, uniformity in procedure, jurisdiction, or powers is not required. The constitutional provision respecting writs of error to the Court of Appeals from the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah and other like courts concerns only the right of review by direct bill of exceptions, and contains no restriction upon the Legislature in fixing the compensation of the officers of other city courts in a manner different from that prescribed for the officers of the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 160.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 139*)—COUNTY EXPENSES—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

The fees of the solicitor of the city court of Richmond county are an expense of that court and lawfully payable from the funds raised to defray the expenses of that court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

4. COUNTIES (§ 139*)—COUNTY EXPENSES—FEES OF OFFICERS.

The provision in the act establishing the city court of Richmond county for the payment of the fees of the solicitor "out of any funds which may be in the treasury," considered in connection with the act of 1894, is to be construed harmoniously with the general law that taxes are to be levied for specific uses and applied only to such uses; and, when thus construed, the fees of the solicitor are to be paid from funds legally available for that purpose. The pleadings admit that there is in the treasury a legally available fund more than sufficient to pay the solicitor's demands.

5. COUNTIES (§ 139*)—OFFICERS—FEES—PAYMENT.

When a case is terminated in the city court of Richmond county by a judgment of nolle prosequi, the solicitor is entitled to his fee for drawing the accusation and entering the nolle prosequi, and the judgment of the court allowing the entry of nolle prosequi cannot be collaterally attacked by the treasurer of the county, upon whom the law devolves the duty of paying the solicitor's costs when duly audited and presented.

6. COSTS (§ 308*)—FEES OF SOLICITOR.

The offenses of stabbing, larceny from the person, and larceny from the house are reduced felonies under the act of March 20, 1866, and the solicitor may charge felony costs in such cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

7. WRIT OF MANDAMUS—ADMITTED FACTS.

Under the admitted facts, the applicant was entitled to the writ of mandamus.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; B. T. Walker, Judge.

Application by J. C. C. Black, Jr., for writ of mandamus to W. A. Clark, County Treasurer. To a judgment making absolute the mandamus nisi, the defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Salem Dutcher and W. K. Miller, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Barrett, E. H. Callaway, and Boykin Wright, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The solicitor of the city court of Richmond county applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the treasurer of that county to pay his fees, which had been audited and approved by the judge of the city court. The treasurer resisted the issuance of the writ, attacking the constitutionality of the act creating the court, and denying the liability of the county for any of the items of cost. The case was heard upon an agreed statement of facts, and the mandamus nisi was made absolute. The treasurer excepted.

[1] 1. The city court of Richmond county was established by the act of September 22, 1881 (Acts 1880-81, p. 574); the title of the act being, "An act to establish a city court in the county of Richmond, to provide for the appointment of a judge and solicitor thereof, and to define their powers and duties." The fourth section of the act was as follows: "There shall be a solicitor of the said city court, who shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of four years; vacancies in the office of the solicitor of the said city court shall be filled in the same manner as is herein prescribed for the filling of vacancies in the office of the judge of the said court; it shall be the duty of the said solicitor to represent the state of Georgia in all cases in the said city court in which the state shall be a party, and in the Supreme Court in such cases upon writs of error from said city court. He shall, for his services in such cases, receive the same fees as are allowed the Solicitor General for similar services before the superior courts and Supreme Court. His fees in the city court shall be paid out of fines and forfeitures when there is a sufficiency of money arising from those sources for that purpose. But all bills for insolvent costs that may become due to said solicitor, when examined and approved by the judge of the said court, shall, upon presentation, be paid by the treasurer of the county out of any funds which may be in the treasury. The fees of said solicitor, for services rendered in the Supreme Court, shall be paid by the state, on the warrant of the Governor, in all cases where the said solicitor shall present the certificate of the clerk of the Supreme Court as to services, and the clerk of said city court to the effect that the defendant was acquitted or was unable to pay cost." By the act approved December 15, 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 215), it was enacted that "the treasurer of Richmond county shall pay to the solicitor of the city court of Richmond county his bills of insolvent costs for services rendered in criminal cases in the city court of Richmond county, upon presentation of itemized bills, audited and approved by the presiding judge; provided the sum paid shall not exceed in any one year the sum of two thousand dollars. It is contended that the provision fixing the compensation of the solicitor and the mode of payment violates the constitutional inhibition against the enactment of any law containing matter different from what is expressed in the title. We do not think this criticism is well founded. It was never intended that the title of the act should embody every detail of the law, but should embrace a description of the general object of the proposed legislation. Details of the general object of the legislation, which are of a subsidiary nature and germane to the subject-matter expressed in the title, may properly be elaborated in the body of the act without being obnoxious to the criticism of plurality of subject-matters. The practical question in every case is the correspondence of the subject-matter in the title and in the body of the act, and is to be determined in view of the subject-matter to which the legislation relates as expressed in the title. The subject-matter of the legislation in the instant case is the establishment of a court, the appointment of the officers, and the definition of their powers and duties. It is not to be expected that the officers are to serve without compensation, and the fixing of that compensation and the mode of payment is germane to the general object of the legislation as expressed in the title. Carroll v. Wright, 131 Ga. 745, 63 S. E. 260; Nolan v. Central Georgia Power Co., 134 Ga. 205, 67 S. E. 656; Smith v. Bohler, 72 Ga. 546.

[2] 2. It is urged that the act creating the city court of Richmond county is unconstitutional, because that court is not like the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah, as in the acts creating those courts neither of the counties in which those cities are located is made liable for the insolvent costs of the solicitor. We fail to perceive the force of this attack on the act. The Constitution declares that "the judicial powers of this state shall be vested in a Supreme Court, a Court of Appeals, superior courts, courts of ordinary, justices of the peace, commissioned notaries public, and such other courts as have been or may be established by law." Article 6, § 1, par. 1 (Civil Code 1910, § 6497). The General Assembly is here given express authority to establish such courts as in the legislative wisdom may be deemed proper. If the court to be established be classed as a city court, it is not required by the Constitution that its jurisdiction, powers, proceedings, and practice shall be uniform with those of other city courts. Const. art. 6, § 9, par. 1 (Civil Code 1910, § 6527). But, before a judgment of a city court can be reviewed by the Court of Appeals by direct writ of error, such city court must be a "like court" to the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah as constituted at the time of the ratification of the Constitution. Const. art. 6, § 2, par. 9 (Civil Code 1910, § 6506). This constitutional provision concerns only the right of review of a judgment of a city court by direct bill of exceptions, and has no application to the power of the General Assembly to provide for the compensation of the officers of a city court in a manner different from that prescribed for the payment of the officers of the city courts of Atlanta and Savannah.

[3] 3. It was within the power of the Legislature to provide that the salary of the solicitor, in whole or in part, should be paid from the county treasury. His salary was an expense of court, to pay which a tax could be constitutionally levied. Clark v. Eve, 134 Ga. 788 (4), 68 S. E. 598.

[4] 4. Another attack on the validity of the act establishing the city court of Richmond county is that the act is repugnant to the constitutional mandate that no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law. The repugnancy is said to result from the provision that the insolvent costs of the solicitor "shall, upon presentation, be paid by the treasurer of the county out of any funds which may be in the treasury," which, it is contended, conflicts with the general law requiring taxes to be levied for specific purposes and to be used for such purposes respectively as levied, and for none other. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 516, 518. Even if the act establishing the city court of Richmond county be held to be a special law within the purview of this constitutional provision, and conceding that the alleged repugnancy does exist, the effect would be not to nullify all of the fourth section, but only that part which authorizes payment "out of any funds which may be in the treasury." That is to say, the insolvent costs would be payable out of the treasury, and the funds applicable to their payment would be those appropriated by the general law. But this objection is completely answered and dissipated by the act of 1894, which makes it the duty of the treasurer of Richmond county to pay to the solicitor insolvent costs to the extent of $2,000, when duly audited and approved by the presiding judge, without specifying out of which the same are to be paid. By this act manifestly the Legislature intended the payment of the solicitor's fees from legally available funds, viz., funds arising from taxes levied to defray court expenses. It is admitted that the county treasurer had in his possession funds raised by taxation for payment of expenses of the city court more than sufficient to pay the applicant's demand.

[5] 5. The fees claimed by the solicitor included charges for costs of $5.25 in each case wherein a judgment of nolle prosequi was entered. The act declared that the solicitor for his services was to receive the same fees as are allowed the Solicitor General for similar services. The law allows the Solicitor General a fee of $5 for each person indicted and 25 cents for the entering of a nolle prosequi. Pen. Code 1910, § 1126. Where a case was terminated by the entry of a nolle prosequi, the solicitor was entitled to the fee charged, and the judgment of the court allowing the entry of nolle prosequi has the same force of conclusiveness ordinarily incidental to judgments, and cannot be collaterally attacked. Peoples v. Walker, 12 Ga. 353; Penal Code 1910, § 282.

6. The solicitor's cost bill also embraced charges for felony costs in cases of stabbing, larceny from the person, and larceny from the house. The contention is that only misdemeanor costs were legally chargeable in such cases. Under Code 1863, § 4268, the offense of stabbing was punishable by fine or imprisonment in jail, or both, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not less than one or more than two years. Larceny from the person was punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for a term of years. Code 1863, § 4309. Larceny from the house, whether committed by breaking any house with intent to steal, or by entering any house with intent to steal, or by stealing from a house after having broken into the same, or by stealing from any house after having entered it, as defined in Pen. Code 1910, §§ 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, was punishable, under the Code of 1863, by confinement in the penitentiary for a term of years. Code 1863, §§ 4312, 4313, 4314, 4315. See Heard v. State, 120 Ga. 843, 48 S. E. 311. The act approved March 20, 1866 (Acts 1865-66, p. 233), declared that "the crimes defined in the following sections of the Penal Code [Code of 1863] as felonies, and punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, shall henceforth be reduced below felonies, and punished in the manner hereinafter set forth, viz.: Sections * * * 4268, when not within the proviso to said section;" sections 4309, 4312, 4313, 4314, 4315; and the next section provided for a misdemeanor punishment. By the act approved December 15, 1866 (Acts 1866, p. 153), it was provided that the fees of the Solicitor General for prosecuting in the superior court the felonies which were reduced to misdemeanors by the act of March 20, 1866, shall remain the same as they were before the passage of the act. Pen. Code 1910, § 1126. These specific offenses were thus declared to be felonies by the act of the Legislature mitigating their punishment, and, though reduced to misdemeanors by the act of 1866, the Solicitor General's fees were to be charged as if they were still felonies.

7. Applying the foregoing rulings to the pleadings and admitted facts, there was no error in granting the mandamus absolute. Judgment affirmed.

CLARK, County Treasurer, v. REYNOLDS.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—REVIEW—REASON FOR DECISION.

Where a Solicitor General applied for a mandamus against a county treasurer to command the payment of certain insolvent costs which he claimed the right to have paid under several local acts on the subject, and the presiding judge granted the mandamus, but, in connection with his judgment, filed a written opinion in which he stated that he thought the earlier acts were repealed by the later ones, and that he had doubts as to the constitutionality of the latter, but would resolve them in favor of the acts, and the respondent excepted to the grant of the mandamus, if the judgment was correct, it will not be reversed, although the reasoning expressed in the opinion may not have been sound.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3403-3430; Dec. Dig. § 854.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 225*)—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS—INSOLVENT COSTS.

The act of 1873 (Acts 1873, p. 225) in regard to the payment of insolvent costs to the Solicitor General of the Augusta circuit from the county treasury, upon recommendation of the grand jury, was not invalid as being in conflict with the clause of the Constitution of 1868 (article 1, § 1, par. 1), which declared that "protection of person and property is the paramount duty of government, and shall be impartial and complete," nor did it conflict with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 225.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 66, 70*)—DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENTAL POWER—LOCAL LAWS—INSOLVENT COSTS OF SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Such a local law, enacted prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1877, was not unconstitutional because it made the operation of its provisions dependent upon the recommendation of a majority of the grand jury; nor on the ground that it conferred on the judicial department of the government a power properly belonging to the legislative department.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 115-122, 129-132; Dec. Dig. §§ 66, 70.*]

4. STATUTES (§ 169*)—REPEAL—REPEAL OF REPEALING ACT.

Where an act of the Legislature provided for the repeal of an earlier act, to take effect at a certain time, and before the arrival of such time the repealing act was itself repealed, the original act stood as if no repealing legislation had been passed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 246-250; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

5. STATUTES (§ 168*)—REPEAL—INVALIDITY OF REPEALING ACT.

If an act which contains a general clause repealing all other acts inconsistent with it is itself unconstitutional and void, it does not operate to repeal any other act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 244; Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 24*)—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF CONSTITUTION—REPEAL OF PRIOR LEGISLATION.

The act of 1873, referred to in the second headnote above, was not repealed by the Constitution of 1877, but was preserved by the clause of that instrument which declared that "local and private acts passed for the benefit of counties, cities, towns, corporations, and private persons, not inconsistent with the supreme law, nor with this Constitution, and which have not expired nor been repealed, shall have the force of statute law, subject to judicial decision as to their validity when passed, and to any limitations imposed by their own terms." Article 12, § 1, par. 4.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-29; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 24*)—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF CONSTITUTION—REPEAL OF PRIOR LEGISLATION.

Nor was such act repealed because the Constitution of 1877 limited the purposes for which counties might levy taxes, one of such purposes being for "expenses of court," and the act mentioned having, before the adoption of the Constitution (as could then be done), made the insolvent costs of the Solicitor General a part of the expenses of court in the Augusta circuit, when properly recommended.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-29; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

8. STATUTES (§ 76*)—LOCAL OR SPECIAL LAWS—INSOLVENT COSTS OF SOLICITOR GENERAL.

The local act of 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 485), and the act amending it in 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 93), making provision for the payment of the insolvent costs of the Solicitor General of the Augusta circuit semiannually upon recommendation by the grand jury, and upon approval of the presiding judge of an itemized bill thereof, were in conflict with the provision of the Constitution of 1877, which declares that "no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law." Article 1, § 4, par. 1.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 77½-78½; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

9. COUNTIES (§ 139*)—EXPENSES—RECOMMENDATION OF GRAND JURY.

Under the act of 1873 a recommendation by the grand jury that the insolvent costs of the Solicitor General accruing at a certain term should be paid, followed by an auditing and approval of the itemized account of such costs by the presiding judge and an order for their payment, was sufficient to require the county treasurer to pay such accounts upon proper presentation thereof, although the grand jury may not have examined and audited the itemized account.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

10. COUNTIES (§ 139*)—EXPENSES—RECOMMENDATION OF GRAND JURY.

Under the act of 1873, after the grand jury had failed to include in their presentments a recommendation as to insolvent costs, the signing of a paper by the individuals who had been members of that body recommending payment of the insolvent costs of the term did not constitute an official recommendation by the grand jury. But where the grand jury omitted to include in their presentments a recommendation of payment of insolvent costs of the Solicitor General, but all the members signed a paper so recommending, and at the next term of court the grand jury at that term recommended that the insolvent costs of the preceding term be paid, as well as those of the current term, this was sufficient to authorize such payment.

11. COUNTIES (§ 139*)—EXPENSES—RECOMMENDATION OF GRAND JURY.

Where affirmative action by a grand jury was required by a statute as a condition of payment of certain costs from a county treasury, its absence cannot be waived by county commissioners, so as to make such account thus payable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Application by J. S. Reynolds for mandamus to W. A. Clark, County Treasurer. To a judgment granting a mandamus absolute, the treasurer excepts. Affirmed.

On February 15, 1873, an act was approved which read as follows: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia, that whenever at any term of the superior court of any county of the Augusta judicial circuit a majority of the grand jury shall so recommend, the judge of the superior court shall grant to the Solicitor General an order upon the county treasurer for the payment of any account for insolvent criminal costs, so recommended to be paid; and it shall be the duty of the county treasurer of said county to pay the same out of any money in the treasury thereof; provided, nothing in this act shall be deemed or considered mandatory to the grand jury; but they shall have full discretion to recommend or not, as they see proper, the payment of said criminal and insolvent costs." Then follows the repealing clause. Acts 1873, p. 225. In 1879 an act was passed which declared that so much of the act of 1873 as applied to the county of Richmond "be and the same is hereby repealed: Provided, said repeal shall not take effect until the expiration of the term of office of the present incumbent." It contained also the usual clause repealing all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the act. Acts 1878-79, p. 405. On December 6, 1880, before the expiration of the term of the then incumbent in the office of Solicitor General, another act was approved which repealed the act of 1879. Acts 1880-81, p. 650. In 1893 an act was passed which was approved December 20th, the title of which was as follows: "An act to limit and regulate the payment of insolvent costs of the Solicitor General of the Augusta circuit, for services in Richmond superior court, out of the treasury of Richmond county, and for other purposes." Acts 1893, p. 485. It made no reference to the preceding acts, but declared generally that the treasurer of Richmond county should pay to the Solicitor General of the Augusta circuit semiannually his bill of insolvent costs for services in Richmond superior court upon presentation of an itemized bill thereof audited and approved by the presiding judge, "provided, the same shall not exceed, in any one year, the sum of two thousand dollars." It also declared that all laws and parts of laws "in conflict with this act be and the same are hereby repealed." In 1894 an act was passed, approved December 15th, amending the act of 1893 by adding to the first section thereof the words "provided further that the grand jury at each term of the superior court of Richmond county shall authorize and recommend the payment of the same in their presentments." It also contained a general repealing clause. Acts 1894, p. 93. The Solicitor General demanded of the treasurer payment of certain bills for insolvent costs aggregating $5,197.50, and accruing at several terms of the superior court as follows: September term 1909, $1,110.25; November term, 1909, $1,041; January term, 1910, $350.50; March term, 1910, $839.25; May term, 1910, $471.25; September term, 1910, $1,225.25; November term, 1910, $180. The county treasurer refused to pay these amounts, and the Solicitor General applied for a writ of mandamus to compel him to do so. In his petition he set out all of the acts above mentioned. The respondent attacked the validity of the act of 1873, and also contended that it had been repealed. He attacked the acts of 1893 and 1894 as unconstitutional. He further set up that, if such acts were valid, there had not been a compliance with them so as to entitle the applicant to the writ of mandamus. By consent the case was submitted to the presiding judge upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts, of which only the following portion need be set out: At no term of the court did the Solicitor General present to the grand jury of that term itemized bills of costs for services rendered, and upon which he claimed a right to collect insolvent costs. The method adopted by him, and which has always been that practiced in the circuit, so far as known, was that at each term of the court the grand jury included in its presentments a recommendation to the effect that the insolvent costs of the Solicitor General and the other officers should be paid, when audited and approved by the presiding judge. Thereupon the bills of costs were made up and presented to the judge, and by him there was entered an order upon such bills stating, "audited, approved and ordered paid." Such an itemized bill, in accordance with the recommendation of the grand jury, and approved as stated for the September term, 1909, amounting to an aggregate of $1,110.25, was presented to the treasurer for payment, which was demanded and refused. The treasurer notified the Solicitor General at the time that he had been instructed by the board of commissioners of roads and revenues not to pay that or any other like bills until further notice. This position was confirmed by a letter from the chairman of the board of commissioners to the Solicitor General, to the effect that no further bills for insolvent costs would be paid until there had been a final determination in the matter. Negotiations continued, looking to the settlement of the question of insolvent costs of the Solicitor General for each succeeding term. The itemized bills were audited and approved by the judge of the court, but were not actually presented for payment, otherwise than by a written demand covering each of the aggregate amounts for the respective terms, and the demand was refused. For the September term, 1909, the grand jury omitted to include in its presentments the recommendation of the payment of such insolvent costs, but all of the members of the grand jury signed a writing recommending that such costs be paid. At the November term, 1909, of the court the grand jury recommended that the costs for the September term, 1909, and the November term, 1909, be paid. At the May term, 1910, there was no grand jury to make a recommendation, "but by agreement between the Solicitor General and the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Richmond county, such recommendation was waived by the said board." The presiding judge granted a mandamus absolute, commanding the county treasurer, on presentation of the bills set out in the petition, to pay them out of any money he might have in the treasury subject to expenses of court. The treasurer excepted.

Salem Dutcher and W. K. Miller, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Barrett, E. H. Callaway, and N. M. Reynolds, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The answer of the respondent raised many points. They may be grouped under a few general heads: (1) Was the act of 1873 violative of the Constitution of 1868, which was in force at the time of its passage, or of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States? (2) Was it repealed by subsequent legislative acts? (3) Was it repealed by the Constitution of 1877? (4) Were the acts of 1893 and 1894 unconstitutional? (5) If the acts mentioned or any of them were valid and of force, was there such a compliance with their terms as to authorize the grant of a mandamus, requiring the county treasurer to pay the insolvent costs involved?

[1] 1. In granting the mandamus absolute the presiding judge filed a brief opinion, in which he said that he thought the acts of 1873, 1879, and 1880 were, by implication, repealed by the acts of 1894 and 1894; that he had doubt as to the constitutionality of those acts, but resolved the doubt in their favor, and granted the writ. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff in error that this was an adjudication that the acts preceding that of 1893 had been repealed, and that the only questions which should be considered arose under that act and the act of 1894. We do not think this contention is sound. If we should determine that the acts of 1893 and 1894 were invalid, of course, they could not repeal by implication preceding acts. The judgment which was rendered was that a mandamus absolute be granted. The views and doubts expressed by the judge would not require a reversal, if the writ was properly granted.

[2] 2. Was the act of 1873 in conflict with the provision of the state Constitution of 1868 (which was in force when the act was passed), which declared that "protection of person and property is the paramount duty of government and shall be impartial and complete" (Code 1873, § 4993), or with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that no state shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws?" The contention on this subject was based on the ground that the Solicitor General was a state official, and should be paid by the state; that the general legislative plan for compensating the Solicitor General for his services was by the payment of a small salary from the state treasury (about enough it was said, to pay his expenses), and the balance from state funds arising from fines and forfeitures; that the act of 1873, which made special provision in regard to the Augusta judicial circuit, imposed the burden of paying the insolvent costs of the Solicitor General upon the counties in such circuit, and necessitated the levying of a tax in Richmond county for the purpose of replenishing the county treasury with funds wherewith to pay such costs; and that this denied to such persons the equal protection of the laws. This contention is without merit. The Constitution of 1868 did not prevent the passage of local laws because of the existence of general laws on a particular subject. The fact that there were and had been general laws as to the payment of insolvent costs from funds arising from fines and forfeitures did not prevent the Legislature from adopting an act supplementing such fund in a particular county. In this there was no denial of the equal protection of the law. Certainly there was none as against the county treasurer. Hammond v. Clark, 136 Ga. 313, 71 S. E. 479.

[3] 3. It was urged that, under the Constitution of 1868, taxation for state purposes was imposed by the General Assembly, and for county purposes by county authorities, and that this act created a necessity for taxation and a liability dependent upon recommendation of the grand jury. It was also urged that the act conferred upon the judicial department of the government a power properly belonging to the legislative department. Neither of these objections to the act is well taken. Where the Legislature had power to enact the local law, making it take effect or become operative upon such a condition, did not violate the provisions of the Constitution of 1868, to which reference has been made. Moreover, the present proceeding is not one to compel the levy of a tax. The money is already in the hands of the treasurer; but he declines to pay the insolvent cost bills of the Solicitor General on the ground that they are not lawful demands.

[4] 4. Was the act of 1873 repealed by the act of 1879? The act of 1879 provided for its repeal, but not to take effect until the end of the term of the then incumbent in office. Before that time arrived, the act of 1880 repealed the act of 1879. It was therefore held by this court that the act of 1873 was not repealed by the act of 1879, but remained of force. Adam v. Wright, 84 Ga. 720, 11 S. E. 893. These acts and counteracts do not present a case of legal execution and resuscitation, but of intercepted death.

[5] 5. Was the act of 1873 repealed by the acts of 1893 and 1894? Those acts each contained a general clause repealing "all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act." If they were themselves valid, they so covered the same subject-matter as that dealt with in the act of 1873 as to repeal it. If they were themselves unconstitutional and void, they did not repeal it. Nothing can properly be said to conflict with a nullity; and a repeal of what conflicts with a nullity is no repeal at all. We shall presently show that the two later acts were unconstitutional. Hence they did not repeal the former act. Barker v. State, 118 Ga. 35 (1), 44 S. E. 874.

[6] The contention that the act of 1873 was repealed by the Constitution of 1877, because not in accord with it, cannot stand. It was expressly provided by that Constitution (article 12, § 1, par. 4) that "local and private acts passed for the benefit of counties, cities, towns, corporations, and private persons, not inconsistent with the supreme law, nor with this Constitution, and which have not expired nor been repealed, shall have the force of statute law, subject to judicial decision as to their validity when passed, and to any limitations imposed by their own terms." Civ. Code 1910, § 6805. No such inconsistency between that act and the Constitution has been pointed out as under the adjudications of this court works a repeal of the former. If all prior local acts thus preserved became at once inconsistent with the Constitution because they were not altogether like the general laws existing or those passed under such Constitution, the preservation would be nugatory. There may be such an inconsistency or such an exhibition of constitutional or legislative intent that the prior local law will be repealed. But such is not the case here. The enforcement of the law in Richmond county and the services of the Solicitor General for that purpose are beneficial. That the local law of 1873 made provision in regard to the compensation of that officer, and that the treasury of the county would have to be supplied with funds from taxation, did not exclude that act from the constitutional classification of local acts "passed for the benefit of counties." The distinction between local acts passed prior to the Constitution of 1877, and by it preserved unless inconsistent with that instrument, and local or private acts passed since the adoption of that Constitution in cases covered by general laws must be borne in mind.

[7] 7. By article 7, § 6, par. 2, Const. (Civ. Code 1910, § 6562), it is declared that the Legislature shall not have power to delegate to any county the right to levy a tax except for certain purposes. One of these is for "expenses of courts." In 1889 an act was passed (Acts 1889, p. 1153) requiring the commissioners of roads and revenues of Fulton county to levy a tax to pay a certain proportion of the insolvent costs not collected by the two plaintiffs, while solicitors of the city court of Atlanta, from fines and forfeitures. In Adair v. Ellis, 83 Ga. 464, 10 S. E. 117, it was held that this claim was not for "expenses of court" within the meaning of the constitutional provision mentioned, and the act was void. Justice Simmons in the opinion said: "It may be argued, however, that the Legislature has the power to determine and define, under this paragraph, what are expenses of courts, and that the courts would be bound by its definition. This may or may not be true. It is unnecessary for us to determine in this case whether the Legislature can enlarge the common and usual meaning of these words or not. It is sufficient for us to say that in this case the Legislature did not say that the claims of the defendants in error were expenses of court." In Adam v. Wright, 84 Ga. 720, 11 S. E. 893, it was held that the act of 1873, now under consideration, was not so modified by the constitutional provision just mentioned as to forbid payment of insolvent costs out of any funds in the county treasury raised by taxation, such costs having, before the adoption of the Constitution of 1877, been made part of the expenses of court in the Augusta circuit, when properly recommended, as could then be done. See, also, Massey v. Bowles, 99 Ga. 216, 25 S. E. 270; Moore v. Houston County, 128 Ga. 187, 57 S. E. 236; Duer v. Thweatt, 39 Ga. 578; Adam v. Cohen, 84 Ga. 725, 11 S. E. 895. In Houston County v. Kersh & Wynne, 82 Ga. 252, 10 S. E. 199, it was held that, in the absence of a statute providing for the publication of the general present-ments of the grand jury as a part of the proceedings of the court, there was no authority of law for paying out of the public funds for such a publication. Subsequently an act was passed providing for such publication and the payment thereof as a part of the expenses of court. See Howard v. Early County, 104 Ga. 672, 30 S. E. 880. It has not been held that the Legislature can exercise the judicial function of construing a clause of the Constitution, but it seems to have been recognized that they may require certain things to be done and certain legitimate expenses to be incurred. In those cases, however, the question arose in regard to the taxing power of counties.

[8] 8. The act of 1893 provided that "the treasurer of Richmond county shall pay to the Solicitor General of the Augusta circuit, semiannually, his bill of insolvent costs for services in Richmond superior court, upon presentation of itemized bill for same, audited and approved by the presiding judge; provided, the sum paid shall not exceed, in any one year, the sum of two thousand dollars." Acts 1893, p. 485. This was amended by the act of 1894 by adding: "Provided further, that the grand jury, at each term of the superior court of Richmond county, shall authorize and recommend the payment of the same in their presentments." Acts 1894, p. 93. Both of these acts were attacked on the ground, among others, that they were in conflict with the provision of the Constitution which declares that "no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law." Article 1, § 4, par. 1 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6391). This ground of attack is well taken. In Moore v. Houston County, supra, it was said (referring to a local act fixing the compensation of the treasurer of Houston county, passed prior to the Constitution of 1877): "While special legislation of the character of the act of 1875 [Acts 1875, p. 286] is no longer permissible since the Constitution of 1877 went into effect, still a previous valid special law was not repealed by the adoption of that Constitution." The act of 1873 was not repealed, as already stated. It was subject to repeal; but new and additional local legislation could not be enacted after the passage of the Constitution of 1877, where provision had been made on the subject by an existing general law. Houston County v. Killen, 76 Ga. 826. When the two later acts mentioned were passed, there was a general law in existence on the subject of the salary and fees of the Solicitor General, and their payment from the fine and forfeiture funds. Pen. Code 1910, §§ 1112, 1130. The Legislature could not then provide by local act for the payment of insolvent costs to the Solicitor General of the Augusta circuit from the county treasury of Richmond county.

It was argued in the brief of counsel for defendant in error that the Constitution prohibited "special" legislation; that this differed from local legislation; that the difference had not been regarded by this court in former decisions; and that it should now be held that the Constitution of 1877 did not prevent local legislation from being enacted, although there might be in existence a general law covering the subject. To give the Constitution such a construction would be to permit the evil at which this provision was largely aimed, the passing of a law to govern the whole state, and then allowing every militia district, county, judicial circuit or other division of the state, or the officers thereof, to obtain special legislative dispensation on the same subject, so that, while the law purported to operate throughout the state, a great part of the state's territory might be exempt from the mandate, and a state law might practically cease to be a state law. The Constitution not only prohibits a special law in any case for which a provision has been made by an existing general law, but in the same connection declares that "laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation throughout the state," and also provides for the preservation of local laws already passed and not inconsistent with that instrument; thus showing that the word "special" was not used in the restricted sense contended for by counsel for defendant in error. In Mathis v. Jones, 84 Ga. 804, 11 S. E. 1018, the subject was fully considered. It was there said: "You cannot make a general statute cease to be general otherwise than by another statute repealing it. That is, under the Constitution of 1877, you cannot repeal a general law in part by a local law; for in the eye of the Constitution every local law is special relatively to a general law. * * * They [general statutes] cannot be deprived of their force in one part of the state without simultaneously depriving them of force in every other part. They can be killed, but not mutilated. The smallest of their territorial members cannot be cut off." Such has been the uniform construction of this court, and it was reaffirmed as late as Futrell v. George, 135 Ga. 265, 69 S. E. 182. We think it a correct interpretation of the Constitution, and we decline to depart from it. There is no question here of amending or modifying a general law by another general law or of legitimate classification which may make a law general in character. Nor is an act in regard to a city court involved.

[§] 9. It was contended that, if the act of 1873 remained in force, there had been no sufficient compliance with its terms to authorize the Solicitor General to demand payment of his insolvent cost bills. It was urged that the act required an itemized account of the insolvent costs of the term, of which payment was sought, to be presented to the grand jury and passed upon by that body, before presentation to the judge. The act declared that, "whenever at any term * * * a majority of the grand jury shall so recommend, the judge shall grant an order for the payment of any account for insolvent criminal costs, so recommended to be paid." It then provided that nothing in the act should be deemed mandatory to the grand jury; but they should have full discretion "to recommend or not, as they see proper, the payment of said criminal and insolvent costs." It is not entirely clear whether it was intended that the grand jury should investigate the items of the cost bill, or whether they could recommend in general terms the payment of the insolvent costs. The discretionary power of recommending or not does not apply merely to an auditing of an itemized account. It seems rather to confer a discretionary authority to determine whether the insolvent costs of the Solicitor General shall be paid from the county treasury. This construction also comports with the opening words of the act, that whenever at any term of the superior court a majority of the grand jury "shall so recommend," etc. The possible uncertainty arises from the repetition of the words "so recommended to be paid," and the question whether those words qualify the words "any account," so as to require an itemized account to be presented and recommended. It is a matter of common knowledge that the most active work of the Solicitor General in prosecuting cases does not begin until after the grand jury have brought in indictments or presentments, and that a large part of his services on account of which insolvent costs may arise is rendered after the grand jury have acted. By the act organizing the Augusta circuit in 1870 (Acts 1870, p. 38), it was provided that the regular terms of Richmond superior court should continue for four weeks, though an adjourned term should be called, if necessary. If the grand jury should finish their labors during the first week, and the criminal docket be called during the second or third week, under the construction of the act contended for they could not be discharged, but would be compelled to return at the close of the term to pass upon the itemized accounts of the Solicitor General, or else they could take no action in the matter. The fees allowed that officer are fixed by statute. Under the general law then in force, the presiding judge examined the accounts of officers claiming insolvent costs, and ordered them to be entered on the minutes, to be paid in the manner prescribed by law. Pen. Code 1910, § 1113. The act of 1873 provided for the payment of the insolvent costs of the Solicitor General from the county treasury when "so recommended" by the grand jury at any term. We think the more reasonable construction of the act is that the grand jury could approve the policy, and the judge could approve the items. According to the agreed statement of facts, this has been the uniform practice in the Augusta circuit ever since the adoption of the act of 1873. For about 36 years the grand juries, Solicitors General, judges, and county officials acted upon such construction before any controversy arose. It is true that long practice cannot make legal that which is illegal. But it can hardly be assumed that all of the officers during this long time intentionally violated the law; and we cannot say that they actually violated it in this respect.

[10, 11] 10, 11. The facts contained in the agreed statement show a sufficient compliance with the act of 1873 to authorize the payment of each of the bills of insolvent costs of the Solicitor General, except in one instance. It appears that at the May term, 1910, there was no grand jury to make a recommendation, "but by agreement between the solicitor general and the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Richmond county, such recommendation was waived by the said board." The law required affirmative action on the part of the grand jury, in order to authorize the payment of those costs. The board of commissioners of roads and revenues could not waive what the law required as a sine qua non. Their waiver could not make that due which under the law was not due. It was accordingly erroneous to grant the mandamus absolute as to the bill of insolvent costs of the Solicitor General for the term mentioned. Direction is given that the judgment be amended accordingly.

What is said above covers the substantial controversy. There were some other contentions, such as that the act of 1873 contained matter in its body which was not covered by its title, that the proviso was inconsistent with the act, etc. It is sufficient to say that, except as above stated, there was no error in granting the writ of mandamus absolute. Nothing herein said conflicts with the decision in Clark v. Hammond, 134 Ga. 792, 68 S. E. 600.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

STRICKLAND v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 5, 1911.)

1. WEAPONS (§ 3*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—RIGHT TO CARRY WEAPONS.

The act of the General Assembly, approved August 12, 1910 (Georgia Laws 1910, p. 134), entitled "An act to prohibit any person from having or carrying a revolver without first having obtained a license from the ordinary of the county of said state, in which the party resides, and to provide how said license may be obtained and a penalty prescribed for a violation of the same, and for other purposes," is not null and void because in violation of article 1, § 1, par. 22, of the Constitution of the state, which provides: "The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have power to prescribe the manner in which arms shall be borne."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weapons, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. WEAPONS (§ 3*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CARRYING REVOLVER.

The act described in the preceding head-note is not violative of the right of the citizen, under article 8, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which declares: "A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weapons, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

Atkinson, J., dissenting.

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

J. L. Strickland was convicted of carrying a pistol without a license, and brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified certain questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered in the negative.

See, also, 72 S. E. 436.

The Court of Appeals certified to the Supreme Court the following questions: "Is the act of the General Assembly of the state of Georgia, approved August 12, 1910 (Georgia Laws 1910, p. 134), entitled 'An act to prohibit any person from having or carrying about his person, in any county in the state of Georgia, any pistol or revolver without first having obtained a license from the ordinary of the county of said state, in which the party resides, and to provide how said license may be obtained and a penalty prescribed for a violation of the same, and for other purposes,' null and void, because in violation of article 1, § 1, par. 22, of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, which provides: 'The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne'? Is this act in violation of the right of the citizen, under article 8, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States (Civil Code 1910, § 6685), which provides: 'A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed'?"

R. W. Adamson and Napier & Maynard, for plaintiff in error. C. E. Roop, Sol., for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. The first question propounded by the Court of Appeals is whether the act of August 12, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 134), entitled "An act to prohibit any person from having or carrying about his person, in any county in the state of Georgia, any pistol or revolver without first having obtained a license from the ordinary of the county of said state, in which the party resides, and to provide how said license may be obtained and a penalty prescribed for a violation of the same, and for other purposes," is violative of article 1, § 1, par. 22, of the Constitution of this state, which provides that "the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne."

[1] 1. First let us glance hastily at some of the English laws which antedated the introduction into the federal Constitution, and into the Constitutions of many of the states, of provisions in reference to bearing arms. As early as A. D. 1328, the statute of 2 Ed. III was passed, prohibiting persons "to go or ride armed by night or by day." And it has been declared that at common law riding or going about armed with dangerous or unusual weapons, to the terror of the people, was always indictable. Bish. Stat. Cr. (3d Ed.) §§ 783, 784; 4 Bl. Com. 149. By the act of 22 and 23 Car. II, c. 25, § 3, it was provided that no person who had not lands of the yearly value of £100, except certain specified persons, should be allowed to keep a gun, etc. James II arbitrarily disarmed the Protestant population, and quartered Catholic soldiers among the people. After the revolution which forced his abdication, in the first year of the reign of William and Mary, an act of Parliament was passed which recited certain abuses which had existed, and asserted certain rights and privileges. Among the grounds of complaint recited were the keeping of a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, and quartering soldiers contrary to law, and "causing several good subjects, being Protestants, to be disarmed, at the time when papists were both armed and employed contrary to law." The Bill of Rights no doubt arose from the conduct of the Stuarts. It followed the Declaration of Rights, to which the Prince of Orange assented. Among other things, it declared that "the subjects which are Protestants may have arms for their defense, suitable to their condition and as allowed by law." This was not an unlimited conference of authority upon the Protestants, but only insured them rights under the law, which allowed persons of a certain rank and condition to have arms.

When the second amendment to the Constitution of the United States was adopted, it declared: "A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." The third amendment also declared that no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, except in the manner to be prescribed by law. Some similar provision has been incorporated in most of the state Constitutions. The language employed has not always been uniform. In some cases the preliminary reference to the importance of an efficient militia is made, and in some it is omitted, and there are other verbal differences. But the common element is the assurance of the right "to bear arms."

One of the first questions which was raised under the constitutional provisions on this subject was whether they were violated by laws which prohibited the carrying of concealed weapons. In the case of Bliss v. Commonwealth, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 90, 13 Am. Dec. 251, decided in 1822, the Supreme Court of Kentucky declared that an act to prevent the carrying of concealed weapons was unconstitutional and void as impairing the constitutional right to bear arms. This ruling has not been followed, but severely criticised. The decisions are practically unanimous to the contrary. Aymette v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 154; State v. Wilforth, 74 Mo. 528, 41 Am. Rep. 330; State v. Reid, 1 Ala. 612, 35 Am. Dec. 44; State v. Speller, 86 N. C. 697; State v. Mitchell, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 229; Wright v. Commonwealth, 77 Pa. 470; State v. Jumel, 13 La. Ann. 399; State v. Buzzard, 4 Ark. 18; note to case of In re Brickey, 1 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 55, 56; Ex parte Thomas, 21 Okl. 770, 97 Pac. 260, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007, 17 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 566, and note.

In several states other statutes, regulatory in their nature, or prohibiting the carrying of certain kinds of weapons, or the carrying of weapons under certain circumstances and at certain places, have been upheld. In Andrews v. State, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 165, 8 Am. Rep. 8, the Supreme Court of Tennessee held that an act of the Legislature providing that it should not be lawful for any person to publicly or privately carry a dirk, sword-cane, Spanish stiletto, belt or pocket pistol, or revolver, was constitutional, except as to a revolver; that the word "revolver" might include a pistol adapted to the equipment of a militiaman or soldier, or a weapon not so adapted; that if the weapon designated by the statute was of the former character the absolute prohibition against it was too broad. In the opinion, in speaking of the arms in the use of which a soldier should be trained, at one place the word "repeater" was used. But it was evident that reference was made to army and navy repeaters of a character used in modern warfare, and not to every pistol which might repeat its fire. The pocket revolver was not meant, for in Page v. State, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 198, the court sustained a conviction for carrying such a pistol. In the opinion it was said that "the evidence fully establishes the fact that the pistol carried by Page was not an arm for war purposes, and therefore, under the ruling of this court in the case of Andrews v. State, decided at Jackson, it was a weapon, the carrying of which the Legislature could constitutionally prohibit." In Fife v. State, 31 Ark. 455, 25 Am. Rep. 556, an act was under consideration which provided that "any person who shall bear or carry any pistol of any kind whatever, or any dirk, butcher or bowie knife, or sword or spear in a cane, brass or metal knucks, or razor, as a weapon, shall be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor," etc. The court in construing the act said: "From the company in which the pistol is placed, and the known public mischief which the Legislature intended by the act to prevent, it is manifest that the pistol intended to be proscribed is such as is usually carried in the pocket, or of a size to be concealed about the person, and used in private quarrels and brawls, and not such as is in ordinary use, and effective as a weapon of war, and useful and necessary for 'the common defense.'" It was held that the act did not infringe the constitutional privilege of the citizen to bear arms.

In State v. Wilburn, 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 57, 32 Am. Rep. 551, it was held that a law prohibiting the carrying of an army pistol, except in the hand, was not violative of the constitutional provision of that state in regard to the right of citizens to bear arms for the common defense, which also stated that the Legislature should have power, by law, to regulate the wearing of arms, with a view to prevent crime. In Haile v. State, 38 Ark. 564, 42 Am. Rep. 3, it was held that a statute prohibiting the carrying of army pistols by nonmilitary persons, except uncovered and in the hand, was not unconstitutional.

In West Virginia an act was passed which made it a misdemeanor to carry about the person any revolver or other pistol, dirk, bowie knife, razor, slungshot, billy, metallic or other false knuckles, or any other dangerous or deadly weapon of like kind or character, or to sell or furnish any such weapon to one whom the furnisher knew, or had reason from his appearance or otherwise to believe, to be under the age of 21 years. Certain exceptions were made as to keeping or carrying a pistol about the dwelling of the owner, or from the place where it was purchased to his dwelling house, etc. In State v. Workman, 35 W. Va. 367, 14 S. E. 9, 14 L. R. A. 600, it was held that, whenever an act of the Legislature can be so construed as to avoid conflict with the Constitution, such construction will be adopted by the courts, and that the act was not unconstitutional. In Ex parte Thomas, 21 Okl. 770, 97 Pac. 260, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007, 17 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 566, it was held that the word "arms," as used in the Oklahoma Constitution, providing that "the right of a citizen to keep and bear arms * * * shall never be prohibited," has reference to such arms as are recognized in civilized warfare, and not to weapons mentioned in the statute of that state which forbade the carrying about the person of any pistol, revolver, bowie knife, dirk, knife, loaded cane, billy, metal knuckles, or any other offensive or defensive weapon, except as in the act provided.

In City of Salina v. Blaksley, 72 Kan. 230, 83 Pac. 619, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 168, 115 Am. St. Rep. 196, 7 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 925, the Supreme Court of Kansas went further than any other case which has come to the attention of the writer, and held that the provision of the Constitution of that state that "the people shall have the right to bear arms for their defense and security" was a limitation upon the legislative power to enact laws prohibiting the bearing of arms in the militia, or any other military organization provided for by law, but was not a limitation on legislative power to enact laws prohibiting and punishing the promiscuous carrying of arms or other deadly weapons.

In Re Brickey, 8 Idaho, 597, 70 Pac. 609, 101 Am. St. Rep. 215, the Supreme Court of Idaho held that, while it is undoubtedly within the police power of the Legislature to prohibit the carrying of concealed deadly weapons, the Legislature has no power to prohibit absolutely the carrying of deadly weapons in any manner whatsoever, in cities, towns, and villages; such a regulation being repugnant to those provisions of both the state and federal Constitutions which guarantee to the citizens the right to bear arms. In so far as reference was made to the federal Constitution, the decision was the result of oversight, as will presently be seen.

An examination of the various decisions, whether dealing with laws against carrying concealed weapons, or with regulations as to the manner of carrying certain weapons, or the prohibition against carrying weapons of a particular character, will show that two general lines of reasoning have been employed in upholding such statutes: First, that such provisions are to be construed in the light of the origin of the constitutional declarations, of their connection with words declaratory of the necessity for an efficient militia or for the common defense, or the like, where they are used, and in view of the general public purpose which such provisions were intended to subserve; and, second, that the right to bear arms, like other rights of person and property, is to be construed in connection with the general police power of the state, and as subject to legitimate regulation thereunder. Where a state Constitution in terms provides, in connection with the right to bear arms, that the state may regulate this right, or may regulate the manner of bearing arms, these words expressly recognize the police power in direct connection with the constitutional declaration as to the right. But even where such expressions do not occur, it has been held that the different provisions of the Constitution must be construed together, and that the declaration or preservation of certain rights is not to be segregated and treated as arbitrary, but in connection with the general police power of the state, unless the language of the instrument itself should exclude such a construction. Thus, if the right to bear arms includes deadly weapons of every character, and is absolute and arbitrary in its nature, it might well be argued, as it was in earlier days, that the citizen was guaranteed the right to carry weapons or arms, in the broadest meaning of that term, whenever, wherever, and however he pleased, and that any regulation, unless expressly provided for in the Constitution, was an infringement of that right. The ruling that the Legislature may prohibit the carrying of concealed weapons essentially concedes the police power of regulation to some extent. If this be conceded, the question then becomes one as to whether the particular regulation involved is legitimate and reasonably within the police power, or whether it is arbitrary, and, under the name of regulation, amounts in effect, to a deprivation of the constitutional right.

Various other rights are guaranteed by the Constitution, but they are construed in connection with the general police power of the state. The Constitution prohibits the passage of any law curtailing or restraining the liberty of speech or of the press. But it has never been held that this gave the arbitrary right to a person to make public speeches or shout his sentiments, at all times and in all places, regardless of interference with public order; nor has it ever been held that such guarantees interfered with laws making libel and slander punishable. The right of contract has been held to be a part of the liberty of the citizen, and yet various contracts have been subjected to police regulation. The right to go from place to place is subject to police regulation for the public health and safety, as, for instance, in times of epidemics. Other illustrations might readily be given.

Let us now consider more especially the laws and decisions of this state on the subject. The provision in reference to bearing arms appeared in the Constitution of 1861. It was again incorporated in the Constitution of 1865 and that of 1868. In the latter the same language was used as in the Constitution of 1877, except that it contained the preamble: "A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free people." In the Constitution of 1877, these words were not employed in that immediate connection, but were used in article 10, § 1, par. 1, treating of the militia; and it was doubtless deemed unnecessary to reiterate them in both connections. While proceedings of a constitutional convention may be looked to, they do not furnish a controlling construction of the meaning of words in the Constitution. Such an instrument derives its vitality and force from its adoption by the people, rather than from the intentions of certain members of the convention, or expressions of individual opinions in speeches.

The first case which arose in this state on the subject under consideration was that of Nunn v. State (which was decided in 1846), 1 Ga. 243. At that time it was still a somewhat mooted question whether the second amendment to the Constitution of the United States was a limitation on the power of Congress only, or also affected that of the state Legislatures, although Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, 8 L. Ed. 672, had been decided. An examination of the decisions of courts will show that some very reputable authorities had expressed the opinion that the amendment applied to state Legislatures, as well as to Congress. As already noted, the Supreme Court of Idaho, as late as 1902, still treated it as a limitation upon the state governments, and as a guaranty to the individual citizen. In this condition of judicial consideration, the Nunn Case was decided. It was said: "A law which merely inhibits the wearing of certain weapons in a concealed manner is valid. But, so far as it cuts off the exercise of the right of the citizen altogether to bear arms, or, under the color of prescribing the mode, renders the right itself useless, it is in conflict with the Constitution, and void." As at that time there was no provision on the subject in the state Constitution, and the only constitutional declaration quoted was from the second amendment to the federal Constitution, it is clear that the court took the view that such amendment was a restriction upon the Legislature of the state, as well as upon Congress, and what was said was in reference to the federal Constitution. The opinion contains some broad language used in discussion; but evidently it was never intended to hold that men, women, and children had some inherent right to keep and carry arms or weapons of every description, which could not be infringed by the Legislature, unless as a result of the constitutional provision under consideration. Since that time the Supreme Court of the United States, whose construction of the federal Constitution is conclusive, has held that the second amendment to that instrument was a restriction upon the power of Congress only. In United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. Ed. 588, it was said: "The second amendment means no more than that it [the right to bear arms] shall not be infringed by Congress, and has no other effect than to restrict the powers of the national government. Sovereignty, for the protection of the rights of life and personal liberty within the respective states, rests alone with the states." Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 252, 6 Sup. Ct. 590, 29 L. Ed. 615; Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, 29 Sup. Ct. 14, 53 L. Ed. 97. In Stockdale v. State, 32 Ga. 225, the only point really decided was whether the court erred in refusing a request to give a charge as to what exposure of a weapon would satisfy the act prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons, and in charging to the effect that, if any part of a pistol was concealed, it was a violation of the law. No constitutional question was involved; and, so far as the reference to the Nunn Case mentioned such a question, it was obiter dictum.

In Hill v. State, 53 Ga. 472, an act which made it penal to carry about the person any dirk, bowie knife, revolver, or any kind of deadly weapon to any court of justice or any election grounds or precinct, or any place of public worship, or any other public gathering in this state, except militia muster grounds, was attacked as violative of the provision of the Constitution of 1868 in regard to the right of the people to keep and bear arms. Speaking of the meaning of this clause of the Constitution, McCay, J., made use of the following vigorous utterance: "It is to secure the existence of a well-regulated militia; that, by the express words of the clause, was the object of it, and I have always been at a loss to follow the line of thought that extends the guaranty to the right to carry pistols, dirks, bowie knives, and those other weapons of like character, which, as all admit, are the greatest nuisances of our day. It is in my judgment a perversion of the meaning of the word 'arms,' as used in the phrase 'the right to keep and bear arms,' to treat it as including weapons of this character. The preamble of the clause is the key to the meaning of it. The word 'arms' evidently means the arms of a militiaman, the weapons ordinarily used in battle, to wit, guns of every kind, swords, bayonets, horseman's pistols, etc. The very words 'bear arms' had then, and now have, a technical meaning. The 'arms-bearing' part of a people were its men fit for service on the field of battle. That country was 'armed' that had an army ready for fight. The call 'to arms' was a call to put on the habiliments of battle, and I greatly doubt if in any good author of those days a use of the word 'arms,' when applied to a people, can be found, which includes pocket pistols, dirks, sword canes, toothpicks, bowie knives, and a host of other relics of the past barbarism, or inventions of modern savagery of like character. In what manner the right to keep and bear these pests of society can encourage or secure the existence of a militia, and especially of a well-regulated militia, I am not able to divine." He said that if it should be held (following the opinion in the Nunn Case) that the guaranty of our state Constitution was intended to include weapons of the character mentioned, the act was still not unconstitutional; that the power to "prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne" should be given a reasonable interpretation, and that it included the power to prescribe, not only the particular way in which such weapons might be carried, such as openly or secretly, on the shoulder or in the hand, loaded or unloaded, cocked or uncocked, capped or uncapped, but also the time when and the place where they might be borne. He said: "The Constitution is to be construed as a whole. One part of it is not to be understood in such a sense as will militate against another. It is as well the duty of the General Assembly to pass laws for the protection of the person and property of the citizens, as it is to abstain from any infringement of the right to bear arms. The preservation of the public peace, and the protection of the people against violence, are constitutional duties of the Legislature, and the guaranty of the right to keep and bear arms is to be understood and construed in connection and in harmony with these constitutional duties." Bish. St. Cr. (3d Ed.) § 793. Surely no one will contend that children have a constitutional right to go to school with revolvers strapped around them, or that men and women have a right to go to church, or sit in the courtrooms, or crowd around election precincts, armed like desperadoes, and that this is beyond the power of the Legislature to prevent.

It was argued that the requirement of a license to carry the weapons named in the act, and the fixing of a fee of 50 cents, were obnoxious to the constitutional provision. If this argument be sound, then practically the whole licensing system would be destroyed on the ground that to require a license is not a regulation, but a prohibition. Many persons are required to obtain a license before engaging in certain businesses or performing certain acts; where a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state, it has never been thought that this was a violation of any constitutional right as to person or property. It was contended also that a requirement of a bond of $100, conditioned upon a proper and legitimate use of the weapons, rendered the act obnoxious to the Constitution. It was said that this might deprive some persons who could not give a bond of the right to carry the weapon. There are many cases in which a person may exercise a certain right by giving a bond. Numerous public officers are required to furnish bond before taking charge of the office, but this has not been thought to be unconstitutional because some citizens might desire to hold the office who could not give the bond. The right to appeal to the courts is guaranteed by the Constitution. In order to obtain a writ of attachment, the plaintiff must give bond. It would hardly be said that, because he could not give the bond required by the statute, he was unconstitutionally excluded from appealing to the court in that manner. Illustrations might be multiplied. We think, upon careful consideration, that the regulatory provisions of the act of 1910 are not so arbitrary or unreasonable as to amount, in effect, to a prohibition of the right to bear arms, or an infringement of that right as protected by the Constitution.

Acts of the Legislature ought to be given a reasonable and sensible construction, and one which will not conflict with the Constitution, where it is practicable to do so. County of De Kalb v. City of Atlanta, 132 Ga. 727 (2), 65 S. E. 72; Southern Ry. Co. v. Atlanta Sand Co., 135 Ga. 36 (5), 68 S. E. 807; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 561, 69 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 20. The illustrations given by Blackstone, in connection with his rules for construing statutes, are familiar. Among them is a law forbidding a layman to "lay hands" on a priest, which was construed to include hurting him with a weapon; a law forbidding all ecclesiastical persons to purchase "provisions" at Rome, which should be construed as not including "grain or other victuals," but nominations to benefices, which were known as ecclesiastical provisions; a law declaring that those who in a storm forsook a ship should forfeit all property therein, and the ship and lading should belong to those who staid in it, which was construed not to apply in favor of a sick passenger, who, by reason of his disease, was unable to get out and escape; and a law which declared that "whoever draws blood in the streets" should be punished, which was held not to apply to a surgeon, who opened the vein of a person who fell down in the street in a fit. 1 Bl. Com. 60, 61. We are not called upon to determine whether the act of 1910 offends the rules of rhetoric or English grammar, but whether it violates the Constitution. The act should receive a reasonable construction. Suppose that the owner of a pistol should accidentally drop it from the window of his dwelling to the street. A narrow and literal construction of the act might make it penal for him to pick it up and carry it into his house. It is lawful to sell pistols. But a similar construction might make it impossible for the carrier to deliver them to the dealer, or the dealer to deliver them to the customer. But we will not anticipate that any such construction will be given, but one which will carry out the legislative purpose.

[2] 2. The second question propounded by the Court of Appeals is whether the act of 1910 is in violation of the right of a citizen, under article 8, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides: "A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." What has been said above answers this question in the negative. It is not contended that anything contained in this act affects, or was intended to affect, any federal law passed in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States in regard to the regulation of militia. All the Justices concur, except BECK, J.; absent.

ATKINSON, J. (dissenting). The first question propounded by the Court of Appeals should be answered in the affirmative.

The correctness of the answer depends upon a proper construction of the statute in question, and of the Constitution of this state. In construing the Constitution on the subject, its history is such as to make manifest the intention of the people in adopting it, and the intent, as thus shown, should be given effect. Precedents of other states, consisting of rulings of courts, relative to Constitutions, statutes, and questions which were not identical with those of our own, and which probably had different histories, can have but little, if any, weight in showing the intention of the makers of our Constitution and statutes. Resort to the history of the early English laws on the subject of the right to bear arms is not important, otherwise than as to be suggestive of reasons why it should have been expressly put in our fundamental law that the inherent right of the people to bear arms should never be infringed by the legislative power in the exercise of the right to enact laws.

Section 1 of the act, concerning the constitutionality of which the question is propounded, declares: "That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person to have or carry about his person, in any county in the state of Georgia, any pistol or revolver without first taking out a license from the ordinary of the respective counties in which the party resides, before such person shall be at liberty to carry around with him on his person, or to have in his manual possession outside of his own home or place of business; provided that nothing in this act shall be construed to alter, affect or amend any laws now in force in this state relative to the carrying of concealed weapons on or about one's person; and provided further, that this shall not apply to sheriffs, deputy sheriffs, marshals, or other arresting officers of this state or United States who are now allowed, by law, to carry revolvers; nor to any of the militia of said state while in service or upon duty; nor to any students of military colleges or schools when they are in the discharge of their duty at such colleges." Section 2 declares: "That the ordinary of the respective counties of this state, in which the applicant resides, may grant such license, either in term time or during vacation, upon the application of party or person desiring to apply for such license; provided applicant shall be at least eighteen years old or over, and shall give a bond payable to the Governor of the state in the sum of one hundred dollars, conditioned upon the proper and legitimate use of said weapon, with a surety approved by the ordinary of said county, and the ordinary granting the license shall keep a record of the name of the person taking out such license, the name of the maker of the firearm to be carried, and the caliber and number of the same." Section 3 provides that: "The person making such application, and to whom such license is granted, shall pay to the ordinary for granting said license the sum of fifty cents, which license shall cover a period of three years from date of granting same." Section 4 makes the violation of the act punishable as for a misdemeanor.

The majority refuse to "anticipate" that this act will be so construed as to render it unlawful for the owner of a pistol, who should accidentally drop it from his dwelling to the street, to afterwards pick it up and carry it into his house; or that, if a pistol should be purchased, it would be unlawful for the dealer to deliver it or the purchaser to receive it. When some such question arises, it cannot be passed over lightly. An existing statute prohibits the carrying of a pistol concealed, and in a prosecution for the violation of this statute it has been held that if a pistol be carried concealed but for a moment it is a violation of the law. Brinson v. State, 75 Ga. 882. But the provisions of the act above quoted extend further than to instances such as mentioned by the majority. Under them no person, male or female, under the age of 18 years, other than such as might come within certain classes specifically excepted, could lawfully carry around on his person, or have in his manual possession, any kind of pistol or revolver, for any purpose whatever, in any conceivable manner, elsewhere than in his own home or place of business. Nor could any person over the age of 18 years do so without first having obtained a license so to do from the ordinary of the county, and having given bond and paid the prescribed fee. Relatively to a person under the age of 18 years, it matters not what the conditions or causes might be that would render it necessary for him or her, as the case might be, to go to or from his home or place of business, or what dangers might be encountered on the way, or how great the necessity for a pistol or revolver for the protection of self or property, he would violate the statute if on the way he carried in his hand, or otherwise about his person, a pistol or revolver. The same would apply to all persons over the age of 18 years, not falling within any of the excepted classes, unless they had complied with the prescribed conditions relative to obtaining a license, giving bond, and paying the fee. A nonresident, without a place of business, could not obtain a license. If there were a vacancy in the office of the ordinary, no person could obtain a license. However distasteful or inconvenient it might be to a law-abiding citizen to take out a license and be recorded as the carrier of a pistol, or, in case of remote distance from the ordinary, or inaccessibility to his office, however great the necessity of carrying a pistol or revolver for self-protection, before a license could be obtained, it would be a violation of this statute to carry any kind of a pistol or revolver in any manner whatever, and punishable as for a misdemeanor.

Whatever else might be said of this statute, it ought not to be held that it does not infringe the right to carry a pistol or revolver. As the statute is to be construed as infringing the right to carry a pistol or revolver, it only remains to determine whether "pistols or revolvers," as contemplated by this act, are to be classed as "arms," within the meaning of the Constitution of this state, which declares that "the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have the power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne." If they were so contemplated, then the act is obnoxious to this clause of the Constitution. The act contemplates all pistols and revolvers, because it excepts none. If it had not contemplated specially pistols and revolvers, such as belong to the accoutrement of the militia, the militia would not have been included among the classes which were excepted from its operation. By such an exception, the act gave to the militia the right of carrying pistols and revolvers of the kind which it undertook to deny to other people. If it were a proper test and right to hold that the Constitution, by the use of the word "arms," contemplated only such as were borne by the militia, this act, according to the manifest purpose and intent of the Legislature, would antagonize the Constitution; but this dissent is not rested on that proposition. Before our Constitution contained any declaration against the infringement upon the right of the people to bear arms, it was thought by this court that the second amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is set forth in the second question propounded by the Court of Appeals, prohibited legislation by state Legislatures which infringed the right to bear arms, and that the Constitution last mentioned, which did not refer to "pistols or revolvers," otherwise than as might be comprehended by the word "arms," contemplated pistols. That such was the understanding of this court at that time is shown by the decision rendered in the case of Nunn v. State, 1 Ga. 243, which has been referred to by the majority. Nunn had been convicted under the act of 1837, which made it a misdemeanor "for any merchant or vender of wares or merchandise in this state, or any person or persons whatever, to sell, or to offer to sell, or to keep or to have about their persons, or elsewhere, any of the hereinafter described weapons, to wit: Bowie or any other kinds of knives, manufactured and sold for the purpose of wearing or carrying the same as arms of offense or defense; pistols, dirks, sword-canes, spears, etc., shall also be contemplated in this act, save such pistols as are known and used as horseman's pistols." Cobb's Dig. p. 848. This act was attacked as being unconstitutional, and it was so held by this court, and the judgment of the lower court refusing a new trial was reversed. The effect of the decision was to hold that a pistol was an "arm," in the meaning of the Constitution. The court, expressing the opinion through Lumpkin, J., said: "We are of the opinion, then, that so far as the act of 1837 seeks to suppress the practice of carrying certain weapons secretly that it is valid, inasmuch as it does not deprive the citizen of his natural right of self-defense, or of his constitutional right to keep and bear arms. But that so much of it as contains a prohibition against bearing arms openly is in conflict with the Constitution, and void; and that as the defendant has been indicted and convicted for carrying a pistol, without charging that it was done in a concealed manner, under that portion of the statute which entirely forbids its use, the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the proceeding quashed."

This decision was rendered in 1846, and was subsequently approved in the case of Stockdale v. State, 32 Ga. 225-227, which was decided at the January term, 1861. No constitutional question was raised in this latter case; but it is pertinent to the present discussion for the purpose of showing that this court construed the word "arms" to include "pistols." In the opinion, Lyon, J., after quoting so much of the opinion as is quoted above from the case of Nunn v. State, supra, said: "That decision has been constantly adhered to from that time to the present, and must continue to stand as the law of this court on that subject." It was further said: "To enforce the law, as the court construed it to the jury, would be to prohibit the bearing of those arms [pistols] altogether. . . . What the Legislature did intend was to compel persons who carried those weapons to so wear them about their persons that others, who might come in contact with them, might see that they were 'armed.'" Subsequently, in 1874, the decision of this court, in the case of Hill v. State, 53 Ga. 472, was rendered. Hill was indicted under a section of the Code which prohibited the carrying of a pistol, etc., to any court of justice, etc. He was convicted, and this court affirmed the judgment of the lower court in refusing to grant a new trial, holding, among other things, that the statute under which he was indicted was not obnoxious to the Constitution of this state, which declared, "a well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have the power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne." McCay, J., speaking for himself, was of the opinion that if the question were entirely a new one he should not hesitate to hold that the language of the Constitution of this state, as well as that of the United States, guarantees only "the right to keep and bear the 'arms' necessary for a militiaman," and did not include pistols; and after criticising the reasoning in the case of Nunn v. State, supra, said further: "But, assuming that the guaranty of our state Constitution was intended to include weapons of this character (which, considering that it was made a part of the Constitution after the decision of Nunn v. State, 1 Ga. 243, is not improbable) we are still of the opinion that the act" under which the indictment was found was not unconstitutional. The decision, however, was placed, not on a holding that pistols were not arms, as contemplated by the Constitution, but upon a construction of that provision of the Constitution which authorizes the Legislature to regulate the manner in which arms might be borne, holding, in effect, that the right to regulate the manner of carrying arms authorized the legislation preventing them from being carried to courts of justices, etc.

The ruling so made was a concession that pistols were "arms," within the meaning of the Constitution, but only saved the statute by construing the power to regulate the manner of carrying such arms into authority to provide that arms should not be carried to courts of justice. There were no other decisions on this subject; but all of these, except the last, were rendered prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1861, which was the first time the makers of the Constitution of this state saw fit to interpose. When they spoke, they made an affirmative declaration which recognized the existence of the right of the people to bear arms, and placed a limitation on the power of the Legislature with respect thereto, and declared that the right should not be infringed. This was done after "arms" had been construed by this court, in Nunn v. State, supra, to include pistols, and after this interpretation had been followed by the decision in Stockdale v. State, supra, in 1861, at which time the construction was reaffirmed. Subsequently the question was dealt with in other Constitutions, as follows: The Constitution of 1865, art. 1, § 1, par. 4 (Code 1868, § 4898) declared: "A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." The Constitution of 1868, art. 1, § 1, par. 14 (Code of 1873, § 5006), declared: "A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free people, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have the power to prescribe by law the manner in which arms may be borne." There was no other provision in the Constitution on the subject until the adoption of the Constitution of 1877, when the question was dealt with as set forth in the excerpt copied in the first question propounded by the Court of Appeals. Without going further, it is manifest that the framers of the Constitution of 1877, by the use of the word "arms," as in that instrument employed, intended to include pistols. It would be strange to impute to them a different intention, when it is considered that the Legislature had formerly so employed it, and the courts had so interpreted it from the time of the decision in Nunn v. State, 1 Ga. 243, up to the time of the decision in Stockdale v. State, 32 Ga. 225, in 1881, and still recognized in Hill v. State, 53 Ga. 472, in 1874, and especially when in the latter case the interpretation was specially mentioned and criticised by the judge rendering the opinion, before such interpretation was yielded to by the court. After such use and interpretation of the word, if it was intended by the Constitution of 1877 to empower the Legislature to deal with pistols on a different footing from other weapons of offense and defense, some change in expression on the subject would have been made.

But in looking to the real intent of the framers of the Constitution, there is still more light on the subject disclosed by Small's Report of the Constitutional Convention of 1877. "One of the aids in constitutional construction is an examination of the proceedings of the constitutional convention." Butts County v. Jackson Banking Co., 129 Ga. 801, 805, 60 S. E. 149, 151, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 567, 121 Am. St. Rep. 244. See, also, Wellborn v. Estes, 70 Ga. 390, 401; Blocker v. Boswell, 109 Ga. 233, 34 S. E. 289; State v. Central R. Co., 109 Ga. 728, 35 S. E. 37, 48 L. R. A. 351; Epping v. Columbus, 117 Ga. 264 (4), 271, 43 S. E. 803; Park v. Candler, 114 Ga. 466, 40 S. E. 523. By reference to Small's Report (page 56), it will be seen that section 19 of the Bill of Rights was: "A well regulated militia being necessary for the security of a free people, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but the General Assembly shall have the power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne." When this section was under consideration, as appears on page 91, it was referred to as section 23, and a motion was made which in effect struck "a well regulated militia being necessary for the security of a free people," for the reason that such a declaration had already been made in the section of the Bill of Rights on militia. After that amendment was carried, Mr. Toombs moved "to strike out all after the word 'infringe,' and strike out 'but the General Assembly shall have the power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne,' insisting that 'the Legislature has no power to prescribe how the people shall bear arms; that they shall not carry them in their boots, or anywhere else that they want to. I think the people have the right to keep and bear arms as they choose for their protection.'" On the other hand, Mr. Warren urged: "I hope the gentleman's motion will not prevail. The experience of all of us is that the General Assembly should have the right to regulate the manner of keeping and bearing arms. There is nothing which provokes bloodshed so much as the indiscriminate bearing of concealed weapons." The motion to amend was lost. Other amendments which were offered, but not adopted, were: (a) By inserting the word "place" after the word "manner," so as to give the Legislature the power to prescribe where a man shall carry arms and where not; (b) "when off their freeholds or away from their homes." Thus it appears from the debates that the members of the convention who framed the provision as it appears in the Constitution of 1877 had in mind that "arms," as referred to in the clause as adopted, contemplated, not merely such arms of warfare as might be used by the militia, but especially small weapons which might be concealed about the person, which was in keeping with the interpretation theretofore placed on the word by the court.

Resort to the general law, relative to the police power of the state, in this discussion, does not aid those who take a contrary view from that above expressed. It is the Constitution which we are construing, being itself the fundamental law; and it regulates and may limit the police power. By the provision of the Constitution in question, it was intended to limit the police power, when it was declared that "the right of the people to bear arms shall not be infringed." This declaration was modified all that it was intended that it should be modified by the other express declaration, "the General Assembly shall have the power to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne." This was affirmative action upon the part of the people in adopting the Constitution, and shows that the matter of restricting the Legislature in the exercise of the police power of the state, relative to the right of the people to bear arms, received special consideration, and that there was no intent to further qualify the broad declaration which favored the right to bear arms. It was intended to guarantee to the people the right to bear arms, so that the Legislature could do no more than to regulate the manner in which they should be borne. This guaranty was to all the "people," and was never intended to be restricted merely to those of the militia, or those intending to become such.

The majority answer the second question propounded by the Court of Appeals in the negative, on account of the reasoning placed in their discussion relative to the first question. I do not concur in the reasons which they urge; but, in view of the ruling in Hill v. State, 53 Ga. 472, U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. Ed. 588, Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 252, 6 Sup. Ct. 580, 29 L. Ed. 615, Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S. 131, 8 Sup. Ct. 22, 31 L. Ed. 80, Fife v. State, 31 Ark. 455, 25 Am. Rep. 556, and Ellenbecker

v. Plymouth County, 134 U. S. 31, 10 Sup. Ct. 424, 33 L. Ed. 801, I concede that the second amendment to the Constitution of the United States relates only to limitations upon the power of Congress, and has no reference to state legislation, and accordingly concur in the judgment that the question should be answered in the negative.

Where, in a defense to a suit on promissory notes, the defendant pleads that there has been a total failure of consideration, because the notes were given for a machine which, by reason of defects, was wholly worthless, and the defendant has testified that it was worthless because, at the time the suit was filed, the machine was so out of fix that it could not be operated, it is proper for the court to admit testimony tending to show that the machine had been repaired, and had been successfully used and operated, since the suit was filed. The fact that a machine may not be capable of operation without repair does not necessarily render the machine totally worthless, and the fact that it did successfully operate when the repairs were made, irrespective of the time when they were made, tends to show that the machine was not in fact without some value.

2. SALES (§ 347*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—DEFENSES—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

Where a defendant, upon being sued upon a promissory note, pleads that it was given for the purchase price of certain personal property, as to which there was a failure of consideration, because of certain latent defects undisclosed, it is error for the court to charge the jury that the defendant could not successfully assert failure of consideration without showing that he had offered "to restore the plaintiff to his former status within a reasonable time" from the moment he discovered the defects.

Action by J. B. Daniel against J. E. Toole. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

POWELL, J. [1] Upon the original consideration of this case the court affirmed the judgment, announcing its decision by syllabus only, the first paragraph of which was identical with what is contained in the first paragraph of the syllabus above. Additionally, it was held that, while there was an error in the charge of the court, it was not material. The plaintiff in error filed a motion for a rehearing. After considering the points presented therein, the court granted the rehearing, and what is now about to be said is explanatory of our reasons for withdrawing the former judgment and substituting the judgment of reversal.

[2] The defendant had pleaded total failure of consideration, and this, of course, includes the defense of partial failure. The evidence failed to establish the plea in toto (for the machine for which the note was given was, notwithstanding its alleged deficiencies, plainly of some value), but it was shown that there had been a partial failure. In one portion of the charge the court instructed the jury that "where a party sets up, as a defense to an unconditional contract in writing, that the consideration totally fails, it is incumbent on the defendant, the moment he discovers the defects, to restore the plaintiff to his former status in a reasonable time." This, of course, was erroneous. The duty of restoring the status applies where the defendant sets up rescission for fraud or breach of warranty, and not where the defense is based on failure of consideration. We did not overlook this in the original decision of the case, but we were then of the opinion that under the peculiar facts of the case the error resulted in no injury. We reached this conclusion upon the following line of reasoning: The court (though without withdrawing or in any wise retracting the incorrect instruction) did at the very conclusion of the charge take up the matter again and correctly instructed the jury. There was some evidence that the defendant had offered to restore promptly. The verdict was for less than the amount due on the notes and claimed in the suit. We concluded that the jury had allowed an abatement of the purchase price because of the partial failure of consideration.

The motion for rehearing points out that the abatement allowed by the jury was not necessarily a deduction because of any failure of consideration, but might have been made because by another plea the defendant had claimed credit for certain payments. After carefully considering the arguments and calculations submitted on the rehearing, we are not at all sure that our former conclusion was not correct. However, such a state of doubt has been created in our minds that we think that the safest thing for us to do is to grant a new trial. The charge complained of is manifestly erroneous, and prima facie prejudicial. The doctrine of no reversal for harmless error should never be applied so as to prevent a new trial, unless the court is reasonably satisfied that the error was in fact harmless.

Judgment reversed.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—MUTUALITY—CONTRACT FOR HAULING LOGS.

Even though a proposal, whereby one party agrees to procure as many teams as he may be able to purchase, and to haul logs for another therewith, at a given rate of compensation per hundred feet, for a definite period, may be lacking in mutuality or definiteness on account of the uncertainty as to the number of teams which the first party may be able to purchase, still, when that party has purchased a given number of teams, and has entered into the performance of the contract, and the other party has accepted the number of teams so purchased and put to work as fulfilling the terms of the proposal, the contract becomes mutual, binding, and enforceable. And if, during the period agreed on, the second party breaches the contract by refusing to allow the first party to continue to perform the contract, a right of action arises in favor of the offended party for the recovery of such damages as he may have sustained, to be estimated in accordance with the usual rules for calculating damages for breach of contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-40; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. DAMAGES (§§ 124, 62, 163*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MITIGATION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in a transaction such as that outlined in the preceding headnote, the offended party sues for the breach of the contract, the measure of his recovery is prima facie full payment at the contract rate; but the defendant may mitigate the damages by showing that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, could have rendered his net loss less than that amount; the burden being upon the defendant to allege and prove this defensive matter. The ultimate measure of damage, after all the facts have been heard, is the net loss incurred by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's refusal to permit continued performance of the contract.

3. DAMAGES (§ 124*)—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Where a party agrees to procure as many teams as he may be able to purchase, and to haul logs for another at a given rate of compensation per hundred feet, for a definite period, and the other party, after accepting the number of teams so purchased and put to work as fulfilling the terms of the proposal, breaches the contract by refusing to allow the first party to continue to perform, and the first party immediately sells his team, claiming that it would be more economical to do so than to continue to keep them until work could be obtained, the item of damages resulting from his loss in making such sale is not the difference between what the teams cost him and what he sells them for, but the difference between what he sells them for and what they would have been worth at the termination of the contract.

Error from City Court of Ashburn; B. L. Tipton, Judge.

Action by J. J. Mimms against J. L. Betts Company. A judgment sustaining a general demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Mark Tison, Perry, Foy & Monk, and Claude Payton, for plaintiff in error. John B. Hutcheson, J. H. Pate, and J. H. Tipton, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The case comes to this court on exceptions to the sustaining of a general demurrer. The material allegations are that the plaintiff made a contract with the defendant on the 1st day of January, 1908, by which it was agreed that the plaintiff would cut and haul logs for the defendant and place them on a tramroad, and that he was to use for that purpose as many teams, not exceeding seven, as he should be able to purchase. The contract was to continue through the year 1908; that is, up to January 1, 1909. In pursuance of the contract he purchased five teams, and worked them until the 1st of June, 1908, when the defendant breached the contract by refusing to allow the plaintiff to do any more hauling. It is further alleged that, if the defendant had allowed the plaintiff to continue to perform under the contract, he would have cut, hauled, and placed on the tramroad 300,000 feet of logs per month for seven months, for which he would have received, at the contract price of $3.50 per thousand, the sum of $7,350, and that, in order for him to have earned the same it would have been necessary for him to pay out as expenses of performing the contract $3,500, which would have left him a net profit of $3,850. It is further alleged that, owing to the time of the breach of the contract (in June, when the season was dull), he was unable to get other employment for his teams, and was compelled to keep them on hand and to feed them, and that this cost the sum of $400; that the teams cost him $2,800; that it was more economical to sell them than to continue to feed them after he could not get employment for them; that he disposed of them at the price of $1,300 whereby he incurred a loss of $1,500. The petition sets forth the times when, and the prices at which, the various heads of stock, of which the teams were composed, were sold, and the specific loss incurred in each sale. But it is unnecessary for us to go into that in this feature of the case further than to say that some of them were sold during the fall of 1908, and the others in the year 1909.

[1] 1. The court having sustained the general demurrer, it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the special demurrers; for if a court errs in sustaining a general demurrer, this court reverses the judgment, and allows the court below to require that the petition be made more specific, in the event any allegation is too indefinite. It is insisted, in the first place, that the contract is unenforceable because it is too indefinite in its terms, and lacks mutuality. Even if it can be said, as it probably can, that in the beginning the contract was indefinite, or lacked mutuality by reason of the fact that the plaintiff did not undertake to furnish any specific number of teams, but only to furnish such teams as he might be able to purchase, still the contract became enforceable and mutually binding when the number of teams which the plaintiff might be able to furnish was duly ascertained by his procurement of five teams and by his putting them to work for the defendant under the contract, and by the defendant's accepting them as satisfying the terms of the contract. In other words, the fact that a definite number of teams were procured, and that both parties acted under the contract and regarded this number as fulfilling the terms of the contract, cured any indefiniteness as to this feature of the contract as originally proposed.

[2] 2. The defendant, having breached the contract in June by refusing to allow the plaintiff any longer to perform, became liable for such damages as arose "naturally and according to the usual course of things from the breach, and such as the parties contemplated when the contract was made, as the probable result of its breach." Civil Code 1910, § 4395. Under the particular facts in this case, the plaintiff would primarily be entitled to recover as damages the gross amount he would have earned with his teams during the remainder of the period throughout which the contract was to continue, less such expenses as he was saved by reason of not being required to perform the contract. However, upon the defendant's breach of the contract, the plaintiff became duty bound to lessen the damages, as far as practicable, by the use of ordinary care and diligence. Civil Code 1910, § 4398. It consequently became his duty to make the deduction to which the defendant would be entitled under the measure of damages stated above, as large as possible; that is, it was his duty to cut out as much of the expenses as possible, or else to make the property which was causing the expenses to earn an income, as an offset against the damages. If it were not for this duty imposed on the plaintiff of lessening damages, he might have kept his teams idle until the end of the year, and have held the defendant liable for the full amount he would have earned by performing the contract, for it costs just as much to keep idle teams as it does to keep working teams. If, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, the plaintiff could have employed his teams profitably in other work, it was his duty to do so. But it was alleged that when the breach occurred it was a time of the year when other work was not available. The plaintiff was confronted with the proposition as to whether it would be more economical to keep the teams and continue to feed them until work could be obtained, or to dispose of them at a loss. It was his duty to act under the circumstances as an ordinarily prudent man would have acted.

[3] He alleges that it was more economical to sell them. If so, the loss thus incurred is an element which may properly enter into the calculation of damages. But as to this element in the calculation this must be remembered: His loss as to teams is not the difference between what they cost him and what he sold them for, but between what he sold them for and what they would have been worth on January 1, 1909, if he had continued to perform the contract with them. Such loss as he incurred by selling the teams after January 1, 1909, was in no sense a loss chargeable to the defendant; for, if he had continued to perform the contract until that date, he would have had the teams on hand, and would still have incurred the same loss. The court erred in sustaining the general demurrer, because the plaintiff showed a prima facie right to recover some amount. It was not necessary for him to allege those offsets to which the defendant may be entitled in diminution of the normal damages. These are matters of defense, as to which the burden of proof rests upon the defendant, Ansley v. Jordan, 61 Ga. 482 (1). The rule of damages and the measure of damages applicable to the present case are substantially the same as those mentioned and outlined in sections 3588 and 3589, of the Civil Code of 1910. When the evidence is all in, the calculation of damages, if liability is established, should be upon the following basis: Take the gross amount the plaintiff would have earned, if he had been allowed to continue in the performance of the contract, and deduct from it such portions of the amount that he would necessarily have expended in fulfilling the contract as were saved to him by reason of his not being required to perform. This second element—the amount to be deducted—is to be ascertained after a consideration of all the facts, and after taking into consideration the duty resting upon the plaintiff of diminishing the damages by putting the teams to work, or by selling them economically. In other words, the verdict should represent the natural net loss to the plaintiff. Chappell v. Western Ry. of Alabama, 8 Ga. App. 787, 70 S. E. 208.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 882*)—REVIEW—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR.

Where, in a suit for damages, the evidence offered is insufficient to sustain an allegation of one ground of negligence laid in the declaration, the court should give a peremptory instruction of nonliability upon that ground; but, if it should not give such instruction, and the defendant should thereafter make a request for instructions applicable to such ground of negligence, he could not thereafter complain that for want of evidence such instruction should not have been given, even though his request should not have been complied with; the general charge upon that subject being correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3591-3610; Dec. Dig. § 882.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 201*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—CONCURRENT NEGLIGENCE.

Among the absolute, continuous, and non-assignable duties of master to servant is the duty of the former to furnish to the latter a safe place to work, and also to refrain from giving orders which will require the servant to put himself in such position as that he will be subjected to risk of injury from a dangerous instrumentality. The failure to perform either of these duties gives rise to a cause of action to a servant injured in consequence of a breach thereof; and this is true, even though other causes, beyond the control of the servant, including the supervening negligence of a fellow servant, may have contributed to bring about the injury of which he complains.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 515-534; Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

3. DEMURRER TO DECLARATION—CHARGE OF COURT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The declaration, as amended, was sufficient to withstand the demurrers, general and special, filed by the defendant. The requests to charge, other than as above treated, in so far as the same were legal and pertinent, were covered by the general charge, which was itself full and free from error. The evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict, and the discretion of the trial court in refusing a new trial was not abused.

Powell, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Columbus; G. Y. Tigner, Judge.

Action by H. B. Gray against the Columbus Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

C. E. Battle and Howell Hollis, for plaintiff in error. Hatcher & Hatcher and T. T. Miller, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant, to recover damages for personal injuries, wherein, in substance, she alleged, that at the time of her injury she was in the employment of the defendant company in its cotton mill, and her business was to operate machines known as warpers; that among other general duties imposed upon her was the duty to keep the warpers clean, and to clean them while they were standing idle; that these warpers were operated by pulleys running from overhead shafting; that on the day of her injury the defendant company was engaged in readjusting its shafting, so as to remove the warpers from one end of the room, where they had been theretofore operated, to the other end of the room; that there were a number of these warpers and they had been placed in position at the end of the room at which they were to be thereafter operated, and other workmen for the company, over whom she had no control, were engaged in transferring and installing the shafting in the new position; and that while they were so engaged in removing the shafting, and attaching it to the ceiling of the room above the place to which the warpers had been removed, she was ordered, by the boss or foreman under whom she worked, to proceed with the cleaning of the warpers; that while she was so engaged in and about her work, almost immediately under where the other servants of the defendant were engaged in installing the shafting, a piece of one of the fixtures connected with the shafting became detached, for some reason, and fell upon her head, causing the injury of which she complains.

She alleged that the persons engaged in removing the shafting were careless and inexperienced; that she did not know of their carelessness or inexperience in and about the work, and, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence on her part, she could not discover the danger incident thereto; that the defendant knew or ought to have known of the danger, and should have given her warning thereof, but failed to do so. She alleged that the defendant was negligent, among other things, because of the failure to warn her of the dangers incident to the removal of the said shafting, boxing, and hangers, which dangers were alleged to be wholly unknown to her, and by the use of ordinary care on her part could not have been discovered by her, but were known, or ought to have been known, to defendant. She alleged that the defendant was negligent because the place where she was instructed to work, considering the character of the work and dangers incident to the removal of the shafting, pulleys, and hangers overhead, was not a reasonably safe place for her to work, and that she did not know, and had not equal means of knowing, that the place was unsafe, and the defendant knew, or ought to have known, of the dangers; further, that the defendant was negligent in not exercising ordinary care in the selection of the servants engaged in the removal of the shafting, boxing, and hangers before mentioned; that the servants so employed were careless, inexperienced, and negligent in said work; that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, of the incompetency of said servants, and that the plaintiff did not know thereof, and, further, that the defendant was negligent in mode and manner of taking down said shafting, pulleys, hangers, and boxing, and in knocking down said boxing, as aforesaid, a part of which fell upon the plaintiff's head. She avers, in respect to this act of negligence, that she did not know that the said boxing was liable to fall, and had not equal means of knowing of said danger, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof; but the defendant knew, or ought to have known, of the danger.

Upon the trial of the case, the evidence in respect to all these matters was somewhat in conflict with the exception of the allegation of negligence of the master in the matter of the selection of his servants. Upon that proposition, the evidence seems to have been insufficient to sustain the allegation of negligence. A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and a motion for new trial was made upon the general grounds, and in addition thereto upon a great many other grounds, only a few of which need be separately considered.

[1] 1. The court, among other things, charged the jury as follows: "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that the master is bound to exercise ordinary care in the selection of servants, and not to retain them after knowledge of incompetency." This charge was excepted to upon the ground that there was no evidence offered which would justify the submission of that issue to the jury. The evidence upon that point was from two witnesses, one of whom, for the plaintiff, testified as follows: "We had taken down shafting before this. * * * There was a machinist helper. * * *

We removed the other part of the shafting all right. I do not know whether I was competent or not. It was the first I had ever done, but we were proceeding to do it in the same way as we had been doing for two or three days before. I have seen shafting removed without using ropes."

Another witness for the defendant, testifying to that point, says: "I am now master mechanic for the Tallassee Mills, and was working with the machines, shafting, etc., of defendant when Mrs. Gray was hurt. The method in which we were proceeding to remove that shafting was in the regulation way, to my best knowledge, and was done with all safety possible. I had worked there ever since the mill was built, in the mechanical department, and I think I am capable and capacitated to do that character of work. We were taking every precaution possible. We were both proceeding in a proper manner to do the work, as near as we knew how. I had considerable experience in that class of work."

Thus it will be seen that the testimony was very slight, as to whether or not the servants were themselves competent to do the work; and the master's knowledge as to their competency or incompetency would necessarily be a matter of inference, as there is no evidence that any inquiry was made by the master to ascertain whether or not they were competent or incompetent, experienced or inexperienced. In this state of the record, it may have been proper for the court to give a peremptory instruction of non-liability upon that ground of negligence; but it appears from the record that the defendant, upon that subject, requested the court to charge as follows: "I charge you further, gentlemen, that the defendant, being a corporation, can only act through agents, and if these agents, no matter what you call them, whether superintendent, foreman, master mechanic, or otherwise, were engaged in and about the work of removing or taking down the shafting, there can be no recovery in this case because of the acts of such agents or servants, unless it be made to appear, by primary proof, that the master was negligent in selecting incompetent servants or agents, or in keeping them after knowing of their incompetency, or could have, by the use of ordinary care, known that they were incompetent. This incompetency must be proven. It cannot be presumed, as I have heretofore charged you, because the presumption is that they were competent." The court further charged upon this subject: "He [the master] is presumed, further, to have used the ordinary care and diligence required of him by law in the selection of his servants, and before the plaintiff could recover she would be bound to prove to your satisfaction to the contrary. The burden is upon her."

In this case it appears that the defendant invoked an instruction from the court upon the very proposition upon which thereafter, in his motion for a new trial, he complains that there was no evidence to justify an instruction. It is true that the court did not give the instruction requested by the plaintiff, but had already given, as will be seen by the extracts from the charge above set out, the correct law upon the general subject. Had the plaintiff stood, in the first instance, upon the proposition that there was no evidence upon which to predicate such instruction, he might have called in question the charge of the court to which he now excepts; but his request, in and of itself, was an admission in judicio that there was an issue of fact in the case upon the question of incompetency of the servants, their inexperience, and the want of ordinary care on the part of the master in their selection, and we think that if there was error, in the first instance, in the court giving the instruction excepted to, that error was waived by the request to charge, which we have hereinbefore set out.

[2] 2. Upon the question as to whether or not the master was negligent in failing to furnish to the plaintiff a safe place to work, and as to whether or not she was working under orders of her superior, appointed by the master to control her movements in and about her work, which orders required her to work in a place where she would be subjected to the risk of injury from dangerous instrumentalities, the evidence was in conflict; but these issues were found for the plaintiff, and we are not disposed to disturb that finding. The evidence was such as to justify the jury in finding that under the circumstances under which the rearrangement of the pulleys and shafting was being made, the place at which the plaintiff did the work at the time she was injured was one at which she would be exposed to perils resulting not from her own negligence but from causes over which she had no control. The evidence further shows, to our satisfaction, that she was at work at this place under the orders of her superior, who, as to that matter, and so far as her movements were concerned, stood in the place of the master. The primary negligence of the master consisted in requiring her to work in a place where she was exposed to these dangers. The proximate cause of her injury was this requirement of the master. The proximate cause of the injury was the breach of the duty on the part of the master to furnish to her a safe place to work, and the breach of his duty, in that he required her to work at a place where she was, without fault on her part, exposed to these dangers. Whether the master knew, or ought to have known, of the dangers, whether he required her to work at this place, or whether she was a mere volunteer were questions which were submitted to the jury fairly, and which they found against the defendant. We do not think that the mere supervening negligence of a fellow servant, or other causes over which the injured servant has no control, should defeat her recovery, where the proximate cause of injury is the breach by the master of either of his nonassignable duties. The various questions urged in the case have been presented in many forms in the various grounds of the motion for a new trial, but the substance of all of them are embraced in the propositions which we have mentioned above.

[3] 3. There was ample evidence to sustain the verdict, and the discretion of the trial judge in refusing a new trial was not abused.

Judgment affirmed.

POWELL, J. (dissenting). I concur in the opinion of the court generally; but there was one instruction on a vital point in the case (not specifically discussed in the opinion, and not of sufficient general interest to the profession to justify further discussion by me now) which seems to me to be directly contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court in Georgia Coal Co. v. Bradford, 131 Ga. 280, 62 S. E. 193, 127 Am. St. Rep. 228. The other members of the court are able to differentiate the facts of that case from those involved in the case at bar, and I am not; so I must dissent.

Where the accused is indicted for the offense of assault with intent to murder, by shooting at another, a plea of not guilty is sufficient to raise both the defenses that the accused did not shoot as claimed, and that, if he did shoot, he was justifiable. However, where the accused unequivocally admits shooting at the person alleged to have been assaulted, and claims that he did it in self-defense, the court should not state to the jury that the defendant contends that he did not do the shooting, and that if he did do the shooting he was justifiable, thus putting him in the attitude of asserting inconsistent defenses.

When, in an action at law, one party seeks to enforce against the other either offensively or defensively a contract purporting to have been made by the latter, he may show, without resort to equity, that the contract was voidable because of fraud, and that with reasonable promptness after discovery of the fraud he offered to rescind and tendered restoration.

When it appears from the bill of exceptions that the plaintiff introduced evidence, and a motion for nonsuit was overruled, and that the defendant introduced in evidence a contract of release from liability, and the plaintiff offered, in rebuttal, to show that the release was procured by fraud, and that the contract had been rescinded therefor, and the court declined the proof for lack of pleading, and the plaintiff then tendered pleading setting up the fraud, which was rejected by the court, and that thereupon a verdict for the defendant was directed by the court, held that, upon this court determining that the trial court erred in rejecting the pleading and proof as to the fraudulent procurement of the release, the judgment will be reversed because of the direction of the verdict, although the record is silent as to the evidence introduced by the plaintiff in support of his case in chief; for, if it was insufficient to support a verdict in his favor, the court should have terminated the case by nonsuit, and not by direction of a verdict.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by A. F. C. Houser against the Savannah Electric Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

O'Byrne, Hartridge & Wright, for plaintiff in error. Osborne & Lawrence, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Mrs. Houser brought suit against the Savannah Electric Company for the homicide of her husband. Among other defenses the Electric Company pleaded that after Houser's death his widow received from the Savannah Electric Benefit Association a certain sum of money and executed a receipt therefor, which operated not only to release the benefit association from liability for death benefits under a fraternal insurance arrangement which was transacted through it, but also to release the Electric Company from liability for the homicide. The Savannah Electric Benefit Association was a relief association having an intermediate connection between the Electric Company and its employes, such as frequently exists between other railroad companies and their employes, and such as was discussed in the recent case of Chandler v. A. C. L. Ry. Co. (Sup.) 71 S. E. 1066. However, the transaction in the present case took place prior to the adoption of the statute now embodied in Civ. Code 1910, § 2785, so that under the rulings in the Petty Case, 109 Ga. 666, 35 S. E. 82, this release, if valid, would have been a complete defense to the plaintiff's action. After the plaintiff had introduced her evidence and had closed her case, the defendant introduced the release, whereupon the plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that the release was procured by a fraudulent representation and concealment of the facts. The court sustained objections to the testimony, on the ground that there was no pleading to authorize it. The plaintiff then tendered a supplemental pleading, in the nature of an amendment to the petition, setting up that the contract was void because procured by certain acts of fraud which were detailed. The court rejected this amendment, on the ground that the suit was proceeding in a court without any equitable jurisdiction, and that the contract of release could not be set aside without the court's exercising affirmative equitable relief. The amendment and the testimony in support thereof having been rejected, the court directed the verdict for the defendant. This is a somewhat meager statement of the facts, but it is sufficient to indicate in a general way the points which are to be decided, and which to our minds control the case.

1. The court ought to have allowed the amendment. When in an action at law one of the parties seeks to enforce against the other, either offensively or defensively, a contract purporting to have been made by the latter, he may show, without resort to equity, that the contract was voidable because of fraud, and that with reasonable promptness after discovery of the fraud he offered to rescind and tendered restoration. Some courts make the distinction as to whether the fraud relates to the physical procurement of the paper or to the gaining of the consent of the contracting party. We think that the uniform practice in this state justifies us in holding that this difference does not apply in our jurisdiction. For example, if a promissory note is given for the alleged purchase price of property, and the holder thereof sues on it in a court of law in a strictly legal action, the defendant may plead that the contract was procured by fraudulent representations as to the property or as to the terms of the contract, or that his consent to the contract was in any other wise fraudulently procured, and that, upon discovering the fraud, he promptly tendered restoration of the status and rescinded or offered to rescind so far as he was able so to do. We have never heard it questioned that such a plea would be a valid defense in such a case, though the court in which the suit was pending had no equitable jurisdiction other than that quasi-equitable jurisdiction which all our courts have of entertaining equitable defenses not calling for affirmative equitable relief. That presents a case of an attempt to enforce the contract offensively. Now, here is a case in which the attempt is to enforce the contract defensively. It is well recognized in our system of pleading and practice that, whenever in an action at law the defendant offers an affirmative defense, the plaintiff may by an amendment to this petition in the nature of a replication set up anything in avoidance of the matter pleaded which he could have set up if the positions of the parties to the suit were reversed: that is, can defend against the matter pleaded by the defendant just as if the defendant as a plaintiff had sued him thereon. Of course, there are cases where the nature and form of the attack upon a contract alleged to have been fraudulently procured is such that affirmative equitable relief is required, and in such cases the attacking party must institute his attack in a court having jurisdiction to grant affirmative equitable relief; that is, in a superior court. For example, a city court, being without sufficient jurisdiction in equity, could not entertain a suit brought to set aside a formal contract on the ground that it was procured by fraud, but our courts have long recognized the very cardinal and essential difference between setting aside a contract for fraud and avoiding it defensively on a similar ground. For instance, a deed made to secure a usurious debt is void. A party may defend against it without resort to equity, but, if he would have the deed set aside or canceled as a cloud on his title, he would have to go into a superior court; the defense in the one case requiring no affirmative equitable interposition, and the relief in the other case requiring it.

The objection, urged by able counsel for the defendant in error, that the benefit association with whom the contract of relief was actually made was not a party to the present case, and that this association was a necessary party to any attack made upon the contract for fraud, is not well taken. If Mrs. Houser had undertaken to set aside the release or to have had it canceled, then the relief association as well as the Electric Company would have been a necessary party to the suit. But not so in this case, where she merely sets up the fraud as a legal reason why the contract should not be enforced against her to the destruction of her legal cause of action. For instance, suppose a note is made payable to A., and A. transfers it to B. (not an innocent purchaser), and B. sues C. (the maker) on it, would it be necessary for C., before he could set up the defense that the note was procured by fraud or fraudulent misrepresentations, to have A. made a party to the suit? We do not understand that any such rule exists. If a principal sues on a contract taken in the name of his agent, does the defendant, who seeks to avoid the contract for fraud, have to make the agent a party? It is a departure from the general rule to allow a railroad company to take direct advantage of a contract made between other persons to the extent of asserting it offensively or defensively in a suit; for ordinarily a right of action or defense under a contract exists only between the immediate parties thereto, and the beneficiary cannot enforce the contract except in the name of the party to the contract suing for his use. However, there is a form of contract as to which the beneficiary may sue directly, and the analogy between the situation there and the situation here is such as to present a fair comparison. We refer to a contract of life insurance. In that case the beneficiary can sue in his own name. Suppose he does sue, and the company defends against the contract on the ground of fraud, is it necessary that the insured (or his personal representative, for generally the insured is dead at the time the suit is brought) should be a party before the defense can be entertained?

[2] 2. It is contended that the facts set up in the amendment to the petition did not show such a state of fraud as to constitute a defense against the contract of release. It will not be necessary for us to set out the facts relied on. It will be sufficient to say that in our opinion such a state of facts is alleged as to make the question of fraud or no fraud a question for the jury. It is further contended that the petition shows on its face that the offer of restoration which is essential to the rescission of a contract was not seasonably made. The release was signed on June 5, 1909, and tender back of the money which she had received from the relief association was made on January 12, 1910. Under all the facts, we think that it was a jury question as to whether the tender was made with reasonable promptness or not. It is said in the argument (though this does not appear from the pleading which was rejected) that as early as June 14, 1909, the Electric Company notified the plaintiff that her claim against the company had been settled by her accepting the insurance money from the relief association. It should be kept in mind that this letter was mere notice that the company claimed that the payment of insurance money had released it, but was not necessarily notice of the actual existence (undisclosed to the plaintiff up to that time) of the by-laws of the benefit association under which such a release from liability could be successfully asserted by the company, and the plaintiff was entitled to a reasonable time within which to investigate the validity of the company's claim before she was required to tender back to the benefit association money to which she was apparently entitled as insurance on her husband's life. The duty of prompt restoration is not so imperative as to the element of promptness as to preclude opportunity for investigation as to one's legal rights in the matter.

[3] 3. Counsel for the defendant in error makes the point that the judgment should in any event be affirmed, because the plaintiff did not bring up the evidence introduced before the jury for the purpose of showing the defendant's liability for the homicide of the plaintiff's husband. The bill of exceptions recites that the plaintiff introduced evidence (without setting it forth); that the court overruled a motion for a nonsuit; that the defendant then introduced the release; that certain evidence tending to show fraud in the procurement of the release was offered and rejected for lack of pleading; that the pleading was then tendered and rejected; and that thereupon the court directed a verdict in the defendant's favor. It is not necessary for us to have this evidence as to the plaintiff's case in chief before us, and counsel for the plaintiff in error very properly left it out of the record. The best, the most effectual way to present a point is to submit it in its bold outline, without the incumbrance of other matter not material to a consideration of the legal proposition involved. A court has a right to direct a verdict for the defendant only when the plaintiff has made a prima facie case and the defendant's proof has overcome that case so fully as to leave no question for submission to the jury. If the plaintiff fails to make out a case of prima facie liability, the case should terminate in a nonsuit and not in the direction of a verdict against him, and, if the court does direct the verdict, the judgment will be reversed. Proctor & Gamble v. Blakely Oil Co., 128 Ga. 606, 57 S. E. 879. So that it is immaterial to the consideration of the question here presented whether the plaintiff's evidence was or was not sufficient to make out a case of prima facie liability. In either event the court ought not to have directed a verdict for the defendant. If the defendant in error had desired to raise any question as to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence to withstand nonsuit, it could have raised that question by cross-bill of exceptions.

While the superior court is, ordinarily speaking, a court of general jurisdiction, still, on certiorari and appeal from a justice court, its jurisdiction is limited, and this limitation is, in the main, in accordance with the jurisdiction of the lower court.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 195*)—CERTIORARI—JURISDICTION OF APPELLATE COURT.

In a claim case, the only issue ordinarily presented is, Is the property subject? The exception to this general rule is where, by reason of the filing of supplemental equitable pleadings, the case is converted from a simple claim case into an equitable or quasi equitable proceeding. As a justice's court is without jurisdiction in equitable proceedings, the only issue that can arise in a claim case in a justice's court is, Is the property subject to the execution? Hence, on certiorari from a judgment or verdict in a justice court in a claim case, the judge of the superior court has no jurisdiction to render against the claimant a judgment for the amount of the debt due by the defendant in fi. fa.; and where the judge, in addition to sustaining the certiorari, enters up final judgment against the claimant for the amount due on the fi. fa. the judgment of the superior court is pro tanto void, and may be attacked by illegality.

GUARANTY (§ 78*)—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

The evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiff, and the verdict for the defendant, being without any evidence whatever to support it, should have been set aside, and the plaintiff's motion for a new trial granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

Error from City Court of Dublin; N. J. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by the Elyea-Austell Company against the Whitehurst Drug Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Ira S. Chappell, for plaintiff in error. J. S. Adams, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Elyea-Austell Company brought suit against the Whitehurst Drug Company on an account with itemized bill of particulars, based upon the following written order: "Elyea-Austell Company. Atlanta, Ga. Date April 16, 1909. Ship to F. M. Harp, Dublin, Ga. One 24 in. frame Flco Bicycle, Kelley bars 1906 Corbin Duplex brake 1-5/8 clincher tires Troxel saddle black. One girl's bicycle, 18in. frame, 26 in. wheels, with a good grade of tires, black. One 22-in. Flco Bicycle, with Atherton brake collar, black. 1 dozen W. P. W. inner tubes, 28x 1-5/8. 300 12-in. spokes. 3 dozen rubber cement. 5 pairs Winner single tube tires 28x1-5/8, Flco trade mark. O. K. Whitehurst Drug Company. Terms 2%, 10 days or net 30 days." The defendant admitted the written order, admitted that the goods as ordered were shipped by the plaintiff to F. M. Harp in accordance with the terms of the order, and that he received them and had not paid for them. The defendant refused to pay the account on the ground that the plaintiff had not sent to it an invoice of the goods shipped to Harp, but had sent the goods directly to Harp, accompanied by the invoice, and had entered the account on their book against Harp, claiming that the letters "O. K.," immediately preceding the name, "Whitehurst Drug Company," placed on the order by it, should be construed to mean that, if the goods were shipped to F. M. Harp, the invoice for the goods was to be sent to the Whitehurst Drug Company, and that, unless this was done, it was understood that the defendant would not be liable to pay the account. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The written order for the goods given by the defendant was an original undertaking by it, and made it primarily liable to the plaintiff. There was no evidence whatever in support of the plea that the letters "O. K." meant that the goods were to be shipped to F. M. Harp, while the invoice was to be sent to the Whitehurst Drug Company, or that there was any understanding between the plaintiff and the drug company that, unless this was done, the drug company would not be liable.

The evidence discloses the following facts: Harp was insolvent and unable to buy any goods from the plaintiff on his own credit, and he induced the Whitehurst Drug Company to order the goods from Elyea-Austell Company directly for him. The credit was extended to the Whitehurst Drug Company and expressly denied by the plaintiff to Harp, and this fact was known to the defendant when the order was given for the goods. There is no commercial or legal reason why the Whitehurst Drug Company was entitled to an invoice for the bill of goods which it had ordered sent to Harp, but it was proper that an invoice should accompany the goods, in order that the party receiving them might verify the shipment. But, even if no invoice had been sent either to Harp or to the Whitehurst Drug Company, this would constitute no reason why the goods which had been ordered by a written order by the Whitehurst Drug Company, and which had been sent to Harp in compliance with this written order, on the faith of which credit was extended, not to Harp, but to the Whitehurst Drug Company, should not be paid, for in view of the fact that the goods as ordered were admitted to have been received by Harp, and the only complaint made is that the invoice was sent to Harp, and not to the Whitehurst Drug Company, of course, the letters "O. K." were subject to explanation by parol evidence. Ordinarily it is well understood that these two letters mean "approved" or "correct." If they had a different meaning in this special case, a meaning that the invoice should have been sent to the person ordering the goods, and not to the person receiving them, otherwise the person ordering them should be released from his contract, this would make a difference, and might be a defense, but there is no evidence whatever to sustain this contention. It did not affect the liability of the Whitehurst Drug Company that the goods were charged against Harp on the books of the plaintiff. The only significance of this fact would be that the Elyea-Austell Company regarded the Whitehurst Drug Company as the guarantor of the account. And, if it was the guarantor of the account, the guaranty was absolute in its terms, and no invoice was necessary to be sent to the guarantor in order to make it liable. The only essential questions were: Were the goods ordered by the defendant? Were they sent as ordered on the faith of the guaranty? And had they been received and not paid for? If so, the defendant was liable to pay for them, and the defense set up was wholly unsupported by the evidence, and the verdict for the plaintiff was demanded.

Judgment reversed.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—INSTRUCTION—CURE OF ERROR.

A palpable slip of the tongue on the part of the judge, in instructing the jury as to an ab-

4. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

No material error appears.

Error from Superior Court, Fayette County; R. T. Daniel, Judge.

Sterling Cochran was convicted of manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

A. O. Blalock, J. W. Culpepper, Lester Dickson, and J. F. Golightly, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Wise, Sol. Gen., and Cleveland & Goodrich, for the State.

POWELL, J. [1] The deceased and the accused had a short quarrel as to the payment of certain rents. The deceased threw a rock of considerable size at the accused, and missed him. The accused jumped or fell out of the wagon in which he was standing, and the two went together, and the accused inflicted the mortal wounds by shooting with a pistol which he had. The deceased was unarmed. This statement of facts presents the case most favorably to the accused. It is substantially his own version of the affair, so far as physical facts are concerned. It is plain that this makes a case of manslaughter. Conceding that the initial attack of the deceased with a rock was intended to be a deadly attack, still when he had thrown the rock and had totally disarmed himself, the accused could claim no justification for shooting him thereafter. Justification cannot be based on a deadly assault, which has been completely ended, unless the assailant has some further apparent ability to continue it. It is true that the defendant in his statement to the jury said: "I done what I done to save my life; I was scared as the man was coming on me. I would not have done it for anything, except to save my life." As he sets up no facts showing any actual or apparent danger to his life at the time of the shooting, the statement which he made in the next breath, and which makes him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, seems thoroughly to justify the verdict of the jury. His further statement was: "He [the deceased] jumped on me, and through heat of passion I shot."

[2] 2. The judge, in the course of his instructions to the jury, by what was a palpable slip of the tongue, stated that in order to reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter there must have been an assault on the part of the person killed, amounting to a felony; but, as a part of the same sentence, he told the jury that if it appeared that the deceased was making an assault, amounting to a felony, upon the accused, and the accused shot therefor, the homicide would be justifiable, and the verdict of the jury should be "not guilty." The inaccuracy came in such a context that no reasonable man, lawyer or layman, would have been confused. It was so plainly a slip of the tongue as not to be misleading. Counsel for the plaintiff in error seem to have recognized this up to the time of the argument of the case in this court; for, while an assignment of error is made upon that portion of the charge in which this inaccuracy appears, no complaint is made as to this particular portion on the ground which we have just been discussing.

[3] 3. In instructing the jury as to the defense of justification through reasonable fears, the court, instead of using the expression, "fears of a reasonable man," used the expression, "fears of a reasonably courageous man;" that is, he told the jury that, before justification by fears alone could be complete, it must appear that the defendant was acting under the fears of a reasonably courageous man. The exact point made is that the Code (Penal Code 1910, § 71) uses the expression, "fears of a reasonable man," and that man who was not reasonably courageous might be a reasonable man. In our opinion, the two expressions, as related to the subject of the Code section, are identical. Fear is the subject under treatment, and, as to the subject of fear, courageousness (as that word is employed, both in judicial phrase and in common parlance) is that quality of the reasonable man to which the provision of the law applies. In other words, when the law states in effect that certain combinations of circumstances which, though not actually fraught with danger, are apparently so may justify a homicide, and then proceeds to define the conditions under which such a set of circumstances may justify, it merely lays down a standard, and that standard is that the circumstances must be such as that a man of normal courage would have been led into a belief of danger by them; and we know of no more accurate expression of common usage to convey this notion than the expression, "the fears of a reasonably courageous man." If reasonableness as to any other quality of human nature, except the quality of courageousness, were to be admitted into consideration in fixing this standard, and were allowed to take the place of courageousness, the standard would at once be destroyed. The expression, "reasonable man," so often found in legal or judicial writings, varies with the context. As to the subject of care, it means a reasonably prudent man; as to that duty of inquiry which the law sometimes imposes for the purpose of affecting a party with notice, it means a man of reasonably good business judgment and acumen; as to fear, it means a man of reasonable courageousness, and so on throughout the whole range of varied human activities.

4. Certain other assignments are made, but, after carefully considering them all, we find that none of them are well taken.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Pike County; Robt. T. Daniel, Judge.

Betsy Dewberry was convicted of violating the prohibition law, and brings error. Affirmed.

Henry O. Farr, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Wise, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Betsy Dewberry was convicted of violating the prohibition law of this state, and her motion for a new trial was overruled. Two witnesses were introduced by the prosecution. One was a detective, employed by the county commissioners, and paid $10 for every case made and sustained. This witness testified that, on the 25th day of December, 1910, the chief of police of the city of Barnesville gave him an empty bottle and 25 cents with which to buy whisky from the accused; that he and the chief of police went to the house of the accused for that purpose, and he went inside and the officer remained on the outside; that in the house he paid the accused 10 cents for whisky, receiving 15 cents in change; that he took this whisky and the 15 cents and gave it to the officer; that he had no whisky in his possession when he went into the house, and no money, except the 25 cents. The whisky bought from the accused was produced and exhibited to the jury. The witness testified positively that he bought this whisky from the accused at the time and place stated in the accusation. The chief of police corroborated this witness, testifying that he gave him the money and the bottle, and went with him to the house of the accused; that before the detective went into the house with the bottle and the money he searched him carefully, and that he had neither money nor whisky on his person; that the detective went into the house, where he remained a few moments, and came back with the whisky in the bottle, and returned to him the 15 cents in change. The officer testified that the character of this witness for the prosecution was bad, and he would not believe him on his oath generally; but in the present case he believed him because of the facts he himself knew relating to the transaction. The principal witness stated that he knew his general character, and it was bad, and sometimes he would believe himself on oath, and sometimes he would not, but that in the present case he was telling the truth. The accused introduced no evidence, but made a statement to the jury, denying that she had sold the whisky to the detective on that day, or at any other time in her life.

The case is brought to this court solely on the ground that the state's principal witness was impeached, and the jury should not have believed him, and that it was the duty of the jury to accept the statement of the accused in preference to the testimony of an impeached witness, who was uncorroborated as to the main facts. There is no merit in this objection, for two reasons: The verdict does not depend solely on the testimony of an impeached witness; that testimony is substantially corroborated by the evidence of the officer; and, secondly, the question of the credibility of this witness was exclusively a matter for the jury. The facts of this case afford this court an opportunity of repeating with emphasis that in no case will it interfere with the verdict of a jury, where that verdict is attacked solely on the ground that it is unsupported by credible evidence. The credibility of witnesses is wisely left by the law of this state exclusively to the determination of the jury; and this court has frequently held that it has neither the inclination nor the right to interfere with any verdict which is supported by some evidence, however slight that evidence, and however apparently unreliable the character of the witnesses who give that evidence. Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

H. C. Combs was convicted of crime in the criminal court of Atlanta. From a judgment of the superior court overruling certiorari, Combs brings error. Affirmed.

P. H. Brewster, Jr., and Munday & Cornwell, for plaintiff in error. H. M. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., and Lowry Arnold, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. Combs was convicted in the criminal court of Atlanta and sought certiorari. At the first hearing of the case in the superior court the answer to the certiorari was stricken, because the judge had adopted an answer prepared for him by state's counsel. See Civil Code 1910, § 5197. The judge answered over; the second answer being substantially the same as the first. He also stated that he had prepared the second answer after refreshing his memory from the petition and the first answer, and that but for his ability thus to refresh his memory he could not remember the case well enough to make an answer. Counsel for the plaintiff in error moved to strike this answer also, on the ground that it was substantially a repetition of the first answer, which had been illegally prepared. Just what benefit could have accrued to the movant from the granting of his motion we do not see. Without an answer the plaintiff in certiorari could not travel. The only legal result in such a case would be a dismissal of the certiorari. The last answer, so the judge states, embodied all the judge's recollection of the transaction. We do not think that the court erred in refusing to strike the answer, but, even if this were error, it has not injured the plaintiff in error.

The certiorari was not meritorious, and the judge of the superior court did not err in overruling it.

Judgment affirmed.

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 224*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—BURDEN OF PROOF—INTEREST OF ACCUSED IN TRANSACTION.

On the trial of an accusation of selling intoxicating liquor, where the defense relied upon was that the accused had no interest whatever in the sale, but acted therein simply as the agent for the purchaser, the burden is on the accused to prove how, when, and from whom he obtained the liquor; and until this is done to the satisfaction of the jury this burden is not carried. Under the facts of this case, the jury were authorized to conclude that the defense was merely a subterfuge, and that the accused was himself the seller, or at least was interested in the sale otherwise than as agent for the purchaser. *Bray v. 1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 507*)—EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICES—DETERMINATION AS TO WHO ARE ACCOMPLICES.

Neither the joinder of a witness in an indictment with the defendant, nor a plea of guilty entered by the witness, necessarily makes him an accomplice with the defendant so as to require corroboration of the witness' testimony on the latter's trial. It is for the jury, from a consideration of the testimony of the witness, wherein he admits his presence at the scene of the crime at the time of its commission by his codefendant, but denies any participation therein by him, and the plea of guilty entered by the witness, as well as any other relevant circumstance, to determine whether the witness was an accomplice of the defendant on trial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 742*)—EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICES—DETERMINATION AS TO WHO ARE ACCOMPLICES.

The court properly left it for the jury to decide under the evidence whether the codefendant testifying was an accomplice; and the verdict may be upheld on the theory that the jury found that the witness was not an accomplice.

Error from City Court of Reidsville; C. L. Morgan, Judge.

Action by George W. Tiedeman against J. H. Rogers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed, with damages.

Way & Burkhalter, for plaintiff in error. E. C. Collins, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. George W. Tiedeman brought suit against J. H. Rogers on an account with itemized bill of particulars. The defendant admitted the correctness of the amount of the account, but insisted that he paid it by giving two drafts for the amount of the account drawn by D. A. Hodges of the Southern Pine Company, Savannah, Ga., and payable to himself, which he indorsed and delivered to the agent of the plaintiff, who accepted the drafts in payment of the account. He further defended on the ground that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in not presenting the drafts to the drawee within a reasonable time; that, if the drafts had been presented within a reasonable time to the drawee, they would have been paid; that the delay in presenting them for payment resulted in their becoming worthless, for the reason that the drawer in the meantime had become insolvent; that at the time the drafts were given to the defendant by D. A. Hodges he was solvent and amply able to have paid them if the drawee had failed to accept or to pay them; that at the time he accepted the drafts from Hodges he did so in payment of a debt which he held against Hodges, and since the laches of the plaintiff in presenting the drafts for collection or acceptance they had been rendered worthless, and he would lose his debt by this want of diligence on the part of the plaintiff, and for this reason he should be released from payment of the account sued on.

[1] In support of his first defense the defendant testified that he had delivered a draft on the Southern Pine Company of Savannah for $66 drawn to his order by D. A. Hodges, to the agent of the plaintiff, who accepted the draft as a credit on the account. The jury were fully authorized, under the evidence, to believe that the agent of the plaintiff who accepted the first draft from the defendant did so simply for the purpose of collecting it and applying the proceeds on the account. The undisputed evidence is that this agent had no authority to receive anything in payment of the account of his principal except the money.

[2] It certainly will not be presumed that the agent had authority to accept the draft in payment of the debt due his principal. The defendant failed absolutely to prove the two defenses relied upon. On the contrary, the evidence clearly shows that the drafts were presented by the plaintiff to the Southern Pine Company, the drawee, who refused to pay them on the ground that the drawer had no funds in their hands with which to pay them. While it does not distinctly appear when the plaintiff presented the drafts to the drawee for payment, there is no evidence whatever in support of the proposition that he delayed their presentation unreasonably. But any delay would have been entirely harmless in so far as the payee of the drafts were concerned because the drawer himself testified that he did not know whether he had sufficient funds in the hands of the drawee to pay these drafts when he drew them and delivered them to the defendant; that at that time he himself was indebted to the drawee.

[3] The second defense relied upon is that the defendant had indorsed the drafts and as indorser thereof was entitled to notice of their dishonor, and that a failure to give this notice to him relieved him from the payment of the debt which he owed to the plaintiff. Of course, there is no merit in this defense. If the suit had been against him on the drafts as indorser thereof, he would not have been entitled to any notice of dishonor. Neither the drawer nor the indorser of a domestic bill of exchange not to be negotiated nor left for collection at a chartered bank is entitled to notice of dishonor. Bank of Richland v. Nicholson, 120 Ga. 622, 48 S. E. 240. It seems to us that the verdict in this case under the evidence is so strongly supported, and the exceptions of law are so barren of merit, that the judgment refusing a new trial should be affirmed, and 10 per cent. damages awarded against the plaintiff in error for the delay consequent from the suing out of the writ of error.

Judgment affirmed, with damages.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 252*)—ACCUSATION IN CITY COURT—FORMAL REQUISITES.

The act creating the city court of Bainbridge prescribes no special form for the accusation to be preferred in criminal cases in that court further than that the accusation shall be founded on an affidavit, and shall be signed by the prosecuting officer of the court.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 252*)—ACCUSATION IN CITY COURT—FORMAL REQUISITES.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

John Flanders was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

P. D. Rich, for plaintiff in error. M. E. O'Neal, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. [1] 1. The accusation, attacked in the present case both by motion to quash made before the trial and by motion in arrest of judgment after the conviction tion, is in the following form: "Georgia, Decatur County. In the city court of Bainbridge, June term, 1911. * * * The following accusation is founded upon the foregoing affidavit of Nancy Flanders, who now in the name and behalf of the citizens of Georgia charges and accuses John Flanders with the offense of a misdemeanor, for that the said on the 15th day of March, in the year 1911, in the county aforesaid, then and there unlawfully and with force and arms did whip, beat, and otherwise cruelly maltreat his wife, Nancy Flanders, contrary to the laws of said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof. [Signed] M. E. O'Neal, Solicitor. Nancy Flanders, Prosecutor." The specific objection is that the accusation alleged that Nancy Flanders charges and accuses the defendant in the name and behalf of the citizens of Georgia when it should so read as to make M. E. O'Neal, the solicitor of the court, the accuser. The act creating the city court of Bainbridge (Acts 1900, p. 104) contains only the following provision on this subject: "That defendants in criminal cases in said city court of Bainbridge may be tried on written accusation founded on affidavit, which accusation shall be signed by the prosecuting officer of said court." The present accusation was founded on an affidavit, and was signed by the prosecuting officer of the court. It seems to be sufficient so far as the act creating the court is concerned.

[2] 2. Counsel for the plaintiff in error bases his contention as to the insufficiency of the accusation on the ground that Pen. Code 1910, § 954, prescribes the form for indictments and accusations. That section does prescribe a form for "every indictment or accusation of the grand jury." Under the form there prescribed the grand jurors, "in the name and behalf of the citizens of Georgia," are made the accusers. We do not think that this section of the Penal Code has any applicability to accusations in city courts further than to furnish a general outline as to how such accusations should be drawn.

[3] 3. We are of the opinion that an accusation in the city court of Bainbridge is sufficient where it is signed by the prosecuting officer of the court and is based on an affidavit, whether the name of the solicitor or the name of the maker of the affidavit is formally employed to designate the accuser who "in the name and behalf of the citizens of Georgia" charges the accused with the offense set out in the accusation. Either form may be adopted. Since the affidavit of the prosecutor is made a substitute for the formal finding of the grand jury as to these misdemeanors, it is perhaps the better practice to follow the form adopted in the present case.

Judgment affirmed.

to be made by the accused, and discredited the force of such statement.

Error from Superior Court, Miller County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

D. M. Roberts was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and brings error. Affirmed.

P. D. Rich and W. I. Geer, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Laing, Sol. Gen., and R. R. Arnold, for the State.

HILL, C. J. [1] Plaintiff in error was indicted for an assault with intent to rape, and was convicted; the jury in the verdict recommending him to the mercy of the court. He filed a motion for a new trial, which being overruled he brings error. The evidence in substance makes the following case: The alleged victim of the assault, a girl 16 years old, in the temporary absence of her relatives from home, was staying at the house of the accused, who was a married man. She testified that on the day of the alleged assault the wife of the accused was absent from home; that she and four small children were at the house with the accused; that she went into a bedroom to let down a window, leaving the two doors to the bedroom open; that the accused came into the room where she was, and took hold of her and threw her down on the floor; that she attempted to scream, and he put his hand over her mouth and said, "Now, dog-gone you, holler"; that he got on top of her, but got up to shut the door, and came back to her and again threw her down on the floor, and that, when he again arose to close a door leading into the bathroom, she got up and escaped from the house, and went over to her home nearby. She testified that he said no word to her except those above quoted, that he did not attempt to unbutton his trousers, or to lift her dress, and that this assault took place while four children, ranging from four to nine years of age, were playing on the front porch right by the room. She further stated that in the scuffle between her and the accused her arm was scratched, but she did not know how it was done. She made no complaint that day, but did make complaint of the assault on the next morning to her aunt. She gave as a reason for not making complaint before that there was no one to whom she was willing to make her complaint except her aunt with whom she was living, but as soon as she saw her aunt next morning she told her; and this statement was fully corroborated by the testimony of the aunt. One or two other witnesses also testified that on the next morning after the alleged assault they saw her crying, and asked her what was the matter, and to one she replied that she could not tell, and to the other she said that the accused had hurt her feelings the day before; that she seemed to be in trouble. The evidence also discloses the fact that there were several houses immediately adjoining the one in which the alleged assault took place. There is some evidence that the accused was drinking on the day of the alleged assault. He introduced no evidence, but denied that he had made any assault whatever upon the girl at any time.

It will be seen from this brief statement of the substance of the evidence that the proof of any felonious intent was weak and unsatisfactory. If the accused assaulted the girl at all as described by her, it would be more reasonable to assume that his intent in doing so was for the purpose of overcoming resistance and obtaining a reluctant consent to sexual intercourse, rather than with an intent to commit the crime of rape. As individuals it seems to us incredulous that he would have attempted to rape the girl under the circumstances, in the middle of the day, with four children playing near the room, with the doors of the room unlocked, with near-by neighbors, and while his wife was only temporarily absent from home. But the question of intent was one exclusively for determination by the jury, and, where acts are proved from which they could have by the exercise of their unlimited discretion deduced the intent of the actor, this court cannot as a matter of law interfere because in its opinion the conclusion that a felonious intent existed is based upon facts weak and unsatisfactory. Therefore, unless the judge in the trial of the case committed some prejudicial error against the accused, this court has no right to disturb the verdict on the ground that it was without any evidence to support it. We will consider the grounds contained in the amended motion for a new trial to determine if there was any material or prejudicial error of law committed on the trial.

[2] The first ground of the amended motion is that the judge erred in a colloquy which took place between him and the Solicitor General in the presence of the jury after the defendant's counsel had begun his preliminary statement as to what he expected to show in defense. The Solicitor General took exception to the statement of the defendant's counsel that he expected to show some improper conduct on the part of the girl with another man, objecting to this statement because it was wholly irrelevant and improper to be made to the jury. The judge stated: "I understand counsel to have made a statement as to what he expected to show by proof. What he has stated is not evidence, and should not be considered by the jury, and the jury would not accept a word of it as true unless supported by proof in the case, or by the evidence he offers." It is contended that this interruption by the Solicitor General and this remark of the judge in the presence of the jury "embarrassed and confused" the accused in subsequently making his statement to the jury in the case, and deprived him of his right to a fair and impartial trial; that the expression used by the judge that the jury would not accept a word of the attorney's statement unless supported by proof in the case or the evidence he offered led the jury to believe that the judge referred to the statement to be made by the accused, and discredited the force and effect which the jury were authorized to give to such statement. This objection to the remark of the judge is manifestly without any merit. He did not refer to any statement to be made by the accused in his defense. He expressly referred to what his counsel stated he expected to prove, and not to what the accused expected to state. The jury could not have understood the remark of the judge that the preliminary statement of counsel as to what he expected to prove should be sustained by the evidence as referring to any statement which the accused subsequently made in his defense.

[3] The second objection made is that the judge erred in the following charge: "So take the evidence in this case, in connection with the defendant's statement, measuring the statement under the rule of law the court has given you, determine what the truth of the matter is, and then let your verdict be in accordance with what you believe to be the truth. There is nothing in this case but the law and the evidence."

It is contended that, when the court charged the jury that "there is nothing in this case but the law and the evidence," it destroyed the weight of the statement of the accused and amounted to an instruction by the court for the jury to wholly disregard his statement, and that as the accused did not introduce any evidence, but relied solely upon his statement, it was tantamount to an instruction to the jury not to accept any part of his statement. The language specifically objected to, that "there is nothing in the case but the law and the evidence," shows by the context of the charge that the learned trial judge was referring to the duty of the jury to disregard any sympathy or public sentiment, and to be guided solely by the evidence. Immediately preceding this general statement the judge instructed the jury that they were authorized to believe the statement of the accused in preference to the evidence, if they believed it to be the truth.

[4] In the third place, it is insisted that the court erred in not charging section 102 of the Penal Code of 1910, defining the offense of battery. While there was evidence of a battery, yet the indictment did not charge any battery. It simply charged an assault with intent to commit rape, and the jury could not legally, under this indictment, have found the accused guilty of assault and battery, even if they believed that the evidence showed that the offense amounted to nothing more than assault and battery. The judge did charge that, if they saw proper under the evidence, they could find the accused guilty of simple assault. This charge was more favorable to the accused than the evidence warranted, for under the evidence the jury could not have found him guilty of an assault, for the evidence proved that the assault was accompanied by a battery.

[5] The objections made to the rulings on the admission of testimony are without any merit. The portion of the testimony of the girl which gave her reasons for remaining at the house of the accused the night after she had been assaulted was admissible as explanatory of her conduct, in view of the alleged assault, and the judge restricted the evidence to this purpose.

[6] The testimony that the accused was drinking at the time of the alleged assault was admissible for the purpose of showing a condition of mind which might have rendered him reckless of consequences.

[7] The alleged newly discovered testimony is purely impeaching in character, and on a second trial would not probably produce a different verdict. We find no legal error, and, while the evidence is not entirely satisfactory to us as individuals, we cannot say from a juridic viewpoint that the verdict is contrary to law, in that there was no evidence whatever to support it.

Error from Superior Court, Terrell County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

Claude Holland was convicted of keeping intoxicating liquor on hand at his place of business, and brings error. Affirmed.

M. J. Yeomans and R. R. Marlin, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Laing, Sol. Gen., R. R. Arnold, and M. C. Edwards, for the State.

HILL, C. J. Claude Holland was convicted of a violation of the prohibition law in keeping on hand at his restaurant and "soft drink" establishment (his place of business) spirituous liquor; and, his motion for a new trial being overruled, he brings error. While there are several special assignments of error which we will notice, the main question is one of fact. Did the evidence warrant the jury in coming to the conclusion that the room in which the whisky was found was a part of the restaurant, or place of business, of the accused? The accused ran a restaurant and "soft drink" establishment. In one corner of the room in which the restaurant was located, there was a peculiar little room, with one door opening into it from the restaurant, and in this little room there was a refrigerator. A suit case, or "telescope," containing 6 pint bottles of whisky, was found in this room, and on top of the refrigerator was also found a bottle about half full of whisky. Around in this room were many empty bottles, which had evidently contained whisky. No other furniture than the refrigerator was found in the room, and the room was quite small, about eight by ten feet. The officers who made the case against the accused did not find him at his place of business when they first went there for the purpose of raiding it. They found him somewhere else, and asked him to go with them to his place of business, which he readily did. He did not have his key to this little room, but stated that his brother Henry had it. After the officers told him that they had to get in there some way, if they had to take a hatchet and break it open, he struck open the door himself. After he had knocked off several planks, he struck with his hatchet inside the room, as though he was "striking at something," and hit the suit case containing the whisky. There was no exit from this little room, except through the restaurant. There were no windows to it, simply a little cut-off in the side of the restaurant. The accused had on several occasions sold whisky, before the whisky was found in his restaurant. He stated to the jury that he was absent from his restaurant the day before the whisky was found there, and he knew nothing of its presence in the little room. His brother Henry testified that he got the key to the little room from the accused, and that while he was present at the restaurant, in the absence of the accused, a man by the name of Lee Slaughter brought the whisky into the restaurant and gave it to him, and asked that he keep it for him until he called for it; that this whisky was in a crocus sack, and he (witness) took it out of the sack and put it in a suit case, where it was found by the officers, and that he and Lee Slaughter drank some of the whisky from the pint bottle, which was left half full on the refrigerator. Lee Slaughter testified that on that night, while on his way to church, he met a negro, who had two large crocus sacks containing bottles of whisky, laboriously carrying them on his shoulder; that the negro asked him to help carry the whisky; that he had never seen this negro before, and did not know who he was; did not ask him where he got the whisky from, or where he was going; that when the negro reached his destination he told the witness to help himself, and the witness took eight pint bottles of the whisky for his share; that he did not pay the negro for them, but the negro presented them to him for his assistance in carrying them; that not wishing to take the whisky to church, he took it to the restaurant of the accused, and there left it with Henry Holland until he could call for it. The foregoing is in substance the testimony illustrative of the presence of the whisky in the little room, with a description of the room and its connection with the restaurant.

[1] Taking all these circumstances together, we are inclined to come to the same conclusion reached by the jury, to wit, that the whisky was the property of the accused, and that the little room was a part of the restaurant. The peculiarity of the construction of this little room, its location with reference to the room in which the restaurant and "soft drink" establishment were operated, there being only one door leading from the little room to the restaurant, the absence of any furniture in the room, except the refrigerator, and the presence of a great number of empty bottles in the little room, would seem to indicate that it was used simply as a hiding place for spirituous liquors, and operated in connection with the restaurant and the "soft drink" establishment of the accused. It was conceded that the little room was entirely controlled by the accused; that only the accused ever went into the room, and that he always kept the key thereto, except on this particular night when it happened to be raided by the officers, and it is significant that, although the accused said that his brother had the key on this night, he failed to find his brother. Why should the brother of the accused have thought it necessary to change this whisky from the sack into a suit case belonging to his brother? According to his statement, Lee Slaughter simply asked him to keep the whisky, which was already in the sack, until he called for it. The statement of Lee Slaughter as to how he came by the whisky was evidently not believed by the jury to be the truth. Indeed, the account which he gives of the negro who was burdened with his load of whisky, and the unprecedented generosity of this negro in giving him as much whisky as he wanted for his assistance, and his self-denial in only taking eight pint bottles of whisky, although the negro told him to help himself without limit, would be a severe tax on the credulity of any, except the most credulous. Certainly, weighing all the circumstances, it cannot be said that the verdict is wholly unsupported.

[2] The first assignment of error contained in the amended motion for a new trial is that the judge erred in refusing to continue the case at the request of Mr. Yeomans, the counsel for the accused. He had been engaged for six days in the trial of cases in the court, and when this case was called he stated in his place that he had had no opportunity to prepare the case, or to consult the witnesses, and was physically and mentally exhausted, and was unable to go into the trial and do justice to his client. In reply to a question from the judge, he stated that he was not sick, but was simply physically and mentally exhausted, and unable to try the case in justice to his client. The judge makes the following note to this ground of the motion: "The defendant had been under arrest about one week. There were two other counsel associated in the case, and one of the associates was a lawyer of about 15 years of practice and experience, and a clever practitioner and a capable lawyer, and a resident of Dawson, who had not been so constantly engaged as Mr. Yeomans, who, the evidence showed, had been active in looking after the evidence in the case and in consulting with the witnesses. While Mr. Yeomans stated that he was weary, and doubtless was, he represented this case with his usual ability, both in the examination of the witnesses and in his arguments to both the court and the jury. The court was nearing the end of the term. Besides, the court allowed him time to consult with his witnesses before the trial began." We do not think that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing to continue the case, especially in view of the statement contained in the note of the judge that Mr. Yeomans, although he was doubtless weary from his previous labors, conducted the case with his usual ability, and in view of the further fact that he had two associates who had not been so constantly engaged as himself. It would seem that an accusation for violating the prohibition law did not involve difficulties that could not have been easily surmounted by three experienced and able lawyers, although one of them was "weary, physically and mentally." Rawlins v. State, 124 Ga. 31, 52 S. E. 1; Brantley v. State, 133 Ga. 264, 65 S. E. 426.

[3, 4] The second exception in the amended motion is that the judge erred in allowing a witness to testify that he had on repeated occasions bought whisky from the accused. The first objection to this evidence is that it was not in rebuttal, and the second objection is that it was not relevant or material to the issue then being tried. So far as the first objection is concerned, this was a matter entirely for the discretion of the court. Besides, an inspection of the brief of the evidence shows that it was in rebuttal, not only of the statement of the accused, but of the evidence in his behalf. It is clearly relevant, where one is charged with keeping whisky on hand at his place of business, as corroborative of that charge, to show that about the time he was charged with having it on hand at his place of business he was selling it illegally. If he was selling whisky illegally, it is not unreasonable to presume from these facts that he kept his liquor at some place; and what is more likely than that he kept it at his place of business, especially if the place of business was a restaurant and "soft drink" establishment, where there was a little room so conveniently constructed and located for the concealment of his supplies?

[5] The next ground of error that we deem it necessary to notice is the exception to the charge of the court in defining the phrase, "the defendant's place of business," appearing in the general prohibition act of 1907. The judge charged that "any nearby room or place used by the proprietor in connection with the business, and in such relation to the actual place of business as to indicate a nearby room or compartment, is also a part of his place of business." This charge of the court was not only fully justified by the evidence, but was in substantial accord with repeated definitions of this phrase by this court. Bashinski v. State, 5 Ga. App. 3, 62 S. E. 577; Jenkins v. State, 4 Ga. App. 859, 62 S. E. 574; Hall v. State, 8 Ga. App. 752, 70 S. E. 211. We conclude that the trial was conducted without error; that the exceptions of law are without merit; and that there is evidence to support the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 28, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ATTACHMENT (§ 377*)—WRONGFUL LEVY—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

When the plaintiff sues for trespass because the defendant caused process against an outsider to be levied on property which the plaintiff owned and held in lawful possession, he cannot recover punitive damages without showing malice, or lack of probable cause, or without showing a willful or wanton trespass.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1389-1397; Dec. Dig. § 377.*]

2. ATTACHMENT (§ 374*)—JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

Where a plaintiff in attachment causes property in the possession of a third person to be levied on as the property of the defendant in attachment, and the third person files statutory claim and gets a judgment in his favor, and the claimant then files suit against the plaintiff in attachment, alleging that the levy was a trespass, the plaintiff in attachment (defendant in the pending suit), in order to avoid an implication of malice and lack of probable cause, may show that the judgment in the claim case, finding the property not subject, was erroneous, though he did not except to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Dec. Dig. § 374.*]

3. ATTACHMENT (§ 375*)—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—DAMAGES—ELEMENTS.

Where a refrigerator used in a dairy business was levied on while in the possession of the proprietor of the dairy under an attachment against a third person, and the levy turned out to be a trespass, the proprietor of the dairy, upon suing the person who procured the illegal levy of the attachment, cannot recover as a part of his damages an alleged loss occasioned to him by his business being suspended for five months (during which the title to the refrigerator was being litigated) for lack of a refrigerator, in the absence of evidence that by the exercise of ordinary diligence he could not procure another refrigerator, or that from poverty or other sufficient reason he was unable to give the forthcoming bond authorized by the statute, which would have allowed him to keep the refrigerator.

4. ATTACHMENT (§ 375*)—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—DAMAGES.

Where a tortious levy is made upon the property of one not a party to the process, and he files statutory claim to the property, and the levying officer holds the property in his possession awaiting the decision of the court, the claimant, upon recovering a judgment finding the property not subject, cannot refuse to take it back from the officer, and hold the person causing the levy to be made liable for its full market value.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Gustave Speth against L. C. Maxwell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. H. & R. S. Cohen and C. E. Dunbar, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Fleming, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. This case has been before the court previously, and the judgment then was reversed on the ground that the court erred in directing the verdict in favor of the defendant. See Speth v. Maxwell, 6 Ga. App. 630, 65 S. E. 580. On the next trial of the case the plaintiff recovered a verdict for $375, and the defendant excepts. The facts are these: Maxwell (whose estate the defendant represents as executrix) had sold to Benson & Devoe a refrigerator and ice box on conditional sale, evidenced by a writing not recorded. Devoe, of the firm of Benson & Devoe, mortgaged this property to Twiname, but in the mortgage there was a clause stating that it was "subject to claim for payment of balance of purchase money on separator and refrigerator." This mortgage was duly recorded. Twiname somehow secured the property, and sold it to the plaintiff, Speth. At the time of this transaction Speth called Twiname's attention to the clause in the mortgage, stating that it was subject to a claim for the balance due on the refrigerator and separator, and Twiname said that it had been paid. Speth, however, did not know who it was that held the alleged claim for the balance of the purchase money. Later on, Maxwell's agent, finding that Speth was in possession of the property, sued out a purchase-money attachment, under the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 5084, alleging in his affidavit, in accordance with that law, that Benson & Devoe still owed a balance of the purchase money, and that Speth was holding the property "in fraud" against Maxwell. The attachment ran against Benson & Devoe as defendants, but was levied upon the property while in the possession of Speth. Speth filed claim to the property, traversed the ground of the attachment, as he had the right to do, and the court in that case found the property not subject. Speth then brought this action against Maxwell for damages, alleging as his causes of action the levy of the attachment upon the property in his possession, the taking away from his possession of the refrigerator and ice box, and the removal of the contents thereof (consisting of milk and butter), causing him to have to close up his business—that of dealing in creamery products. He claimed $200 actual damages for loss of the refrigerator and ice box and of the stock of goods contained therein, $500 for the breaking up of his business, and $1,000 for the humiliation caused him. He alleged malice and lack of probable cause. The court at the first trial considered the case one brought for the malicious use of civil process (i. e., as for a malicious prosecution of a civil remedy), and directed a verdict for the defendant. This court in reviewing that judgment took the view that the case was not an action for the malicious use of civil process, since Speth was not a party to the attachment as sued out (that being merely a case between Maxwell and Benson & Devoe); that the plaintiff's action was for the trespass involved in the levy of process against Benson & Devoe upon property which they did not own, and which he (the plaintiff) did own, and which was in his possession at the time of the levy, thus bringing the case within the provisions of the ruling in the case of Williams v. Inman, 1 Ga. App. 321, 57 S. E. 1009, and cases there cited. We held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover his actual damages, irrespective of any proof of malice or want of probable cause, and that the case was purely one of trespass. The statement of facts attached by the reporter to our former decision may not as clearly disclose the rationale of the holding as it is here disclosed, and the court and counsel in the last trial seem to have been somewhat misled thereby.

[1] We have come to the conclusion that the present verdict cannot be sustained under the evidence. The actual damages suffered by the plaintiff were much less than the amount of the verdict, and we do not consider the evidence sufficient to authorize the recovery of punitive damages. While, as this court held in a former decision of the case, punitive damages might be allowed in the event it appeared that the plaintiff had committed the trespass maliciously and without probable cause, still the entire evidence here is sufficient totally to negative the existence either of malice or want of probable cause, or is insufficient to show that recklessness or wantonness of conduct which is usually essential to the allowance of damages of this character. It is not contended that the plaintiff or his agents who sued out this attachment and caused it to be levied were actuated by any actual malice or positive ill will toward the plaintiff, but it is said that legal malice may be inferred from the lack of probable cause existing for the issuance and levy of the attachment under all the circumstances of the case. We are of the opinion that whether the judgment in the claim case by which the property was found not subject to the attachment was correct or not probable cause nevertheless existed. The only theory on which Speth's title to the property could be considered as superior to Maxwell's reserved title is that he bought without notice, actual or constructive, of the fact that Maxwell had reserved the title in the conditional sale to Benson & Devoe. If with such notice he bought the property, he thereafter held it in fraud of Maxwell's rights, within the purview of Civ. Code 1910, § 5084, relating to attachments for purchase money. It is not insisted that he had actual notice, but it is insisted that, inasmuch as he saw the statement in the mortgage from Devoe to Twiname that Twiname's rights were subject to somebody's claim on the property for purchase money, he had actual knowledge of such facts as to put him upon inquiry, and that inquiry of Twiname alone was not sufficient. We incline strongly to the view that this statement appearing in the title papers by which Speth acquired the property was sufficient to put him upon further inquiry than he made, and hence we lean strongly to the view that Maxwell's title was in fact superior to Speth's.

[2] So far as that title is concerned, the question is now foreclosed in Speth's favor by the judgment in the claim case, but that judgment is not at all conclusive upon the question now involved, as to whether Maxwell had probable cause to believe that the property was subject to his attachment. That question must be determined without reference to what the court finally held in the claim case. For the purpose of showing probable cause for an unsuccessful action, the prosecutor of that action may show that he lost it through an erroneous judgment of the court. Furthermore, he may show that, whether the judgment of the court was erroneous or not, the question involved was reasonably doubtful. Certainly in this case the question involved was reasonably doubtful. Both malice and want of probable cause are lacking. We have not quoted at length from the evidence to show how very cautiously Maxwell and his counsel proceeded in the attachment case, and how very solicitous they were to protect Speth from any injury while the question of his title to the property was being decided, but it is in the record. No part of the verdict can be sustained on the theory that it is a finding for punitive or exemplary damages.

[3] The plaintiff's actual damage consisted in the loss of a small amount of milk and butter, the value of which is not shown by the evidence, and, as he says, in the loss of the refrigerator and the ice box, the highest proved value of which did not exceed $175. He then claims loss of profits from his business for five months at $75 per month. We are of the opinion that the evidence discloses that Speth's damages, so far as they are ascertainable, except the milk and butter, are traceable to his own refusal to protect himself from the result of the defendant's tort in causing the refrigerator and ice box to be levied on. Maxwell's attorney testified that he offered to allow Speth to retain the property in his possession until the question of title could be decided in court, if he would merely give a receipt for the property, showing that he held it subject to litigation. Taking Speth's testimony as a whole, there is a more or less equivocal denial of this offer; but, even if we take his testimony as making an issue over this fact, still it is not denied that he was given every opportunity to hold the property by giving a bond, and that he refused to give any receipt or bond for the property, giving the purely captious and wholly mistaken reason therefor that to do so would be to admit that he held the property in fraud. There is no contention that he was not financially able to give the bond, or that he was not given ample opportunity to do so, and that, if he had given the bond, no damages would have ensued to him. Not only did he have the opportunity of keeping this refrigerator by giving bond, so that his business would not have been broken up during the five months that followed, as he said it was, but there is no evidence that he could not have obtained suitable refrigerators in the city of Augusta, where he lived, for the purpose of carrying on his business; on the contrary, there is evidence that such refrigerators could have been obtained. Speth's only excuse for not buying another refrigerator is that he could not find anything in Augusta that he liked. In fact, he candidly and directly admits that he "made no effort to keep up the business," and for this reason we think that under the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 4398, and the cognate principles of our law, he could not recover for the loss arising from the suspension of his business during the five-months period that ensued immediately after the levy.

[4] As to the value of the refrigerator and ice box themselves, the rule ordinarily may be, as contended by able counsel for the defendant in error, that the wrongdoer cannot compel the adverse party to accept back the property even in mitigation of the damages, and it may be that, if Speth had not filed in court his claim whereby the sale of the property under the attachment was stopped, he could have sued in trover or in trespass, and have invoked this doctrine, but we do not believe that one who files a statutory claim to property and succeeds in having the property found not subject, thereby releasing the levy, can then refuse to take back the property, and hold the plaintiff in the attachment or other proceeding which has been instituted liable for its full value. If the property has been damaged or has deteriorated in value while in the possession of the officer, he may claim damages on that account. An execution or other similar process against one person levied upon the property of another person is a trespass. If the property proceeds to sale, the plaintiff in fi. fa. (and sometimes the levying officer) and the purchaser at the sale, either or all of them, may be held liable as for a conversion of the property, but if the owner of the property should bring trover or any other remedy, and should recover a judgment for the specific property itself, he could not then turn around, and sue and recover the value of the property. Our statute allows the third person whose property has been levied on to file a claim which is in the nature of an action brought for the recovery of the specific property, and, when the claimant succeeds in the claim, he recovers a judgment, the effect of which is to cause a restoration of the specific property to him, and it becomes his duty, therefore, to accept it back from the levying officer, who in the meantime is required to hold it, not as a trespasser, but as an officer of court. The only theory on which the owner of property can recover for the value of it from one who has tortiously taken the possession of it is that he abandons his title so far as any right to own or control the property in future is concerned, and proceeds to hold the wrongdoer liable for the value of the property as if he had purchased it. If one whose property has been wrongfully levied on intends to treat the levy as a trespass and as a conversion of the property, he ought not to interfere with the course of the process by filing a claim; for the claim holds up the disposition of the property until the claim case can be settled. If the plaintiff in fi. fa. is to be considered as having converted the property so as to be liable for its full value, without any right to restore it in mitigation of the damages, he should be allowed to proceed with the conversion of it to his own use. It would be wholly unjust for the claimant to be allowed to file his claim and hold up the disposition of the property, perhaps for months, and it may be until the property has become much deteriorated in value, obtain a judgment declaring the property to be his, and then refuse to take it, and then hold the plaintiff liable for its value as it was on the date the wrongful conversion took place. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff in the present case cannot recover the full value of the refrigerator (it appearing that it had been held subject to his order ever since the judgment in the claim case). Only such damages as were done it during the pendency of that litigation could be recovered.

Throughout this opinion we have treated the proceedings by which Speth succeeded in defeating Maxwell's levy of the attachment as a claim case. The pleadings in that case are not set forth at length in the record, and Speth in the brief recital of these proceedings is not spoken of as a claimant, but as the defendant, and the parties in this court have not spoken of him as claimant, but we have felt it necessary to treat that proceeding as a claim case, for we know of no other procedure by which Speth, not being a party to the attachment, could have succeeded in having the levy dismissed. If it was not a statutory claim, strictly speaking, it must have been some proceeding essentially in the nature of a statutory claim. See Civ. Code 1910, § 5115 et seq. Otherwise, it was a wholly nugatory proceeding, and the judgment thereon was not entitled to any faith and credit as an adjudication. We reverse the judgment, on the ground that the verdict is without evidence to support it, but what we have said will be sufficient to guide the court in the next trial of the case, thus making it unnecessary for us to deal specifically with a number of the errors assigned in the record.

Judgment reversed.

7. INSURANCE (§ 445*)—FORFEITURE—SUICIDE—FRAUD.

If one should procure life insurance upon a false promise, made to the insurer at the time of making the contract, that he would not commit suicide, when, in fact, it was his intention to do so, it would be a fraud, entering into the consideration and into the procurement of the contract, which would render the contract void and against public policy, irrespective of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1152-1158; Dec. Dig. § 445.*]

8. INSURANCE (§ 445*)—FORFEITURE—SUICIDE—PUBLIC POLICY.

In the absence of the fraudulent intent at the time, it would be a fraud on the public, and against public policy, to declare a policy, such as is referred to above, void as against the beneficiaries when the insured had lived up to his contract. As a matter of public policy it is of great importance to hold the parties to a contract voluntarily made, especially when death has removed one of the parties, and closed his lips upon the question raised.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1152-1158; Dec. Dig. § 445.*]

9. INSURANCE (§ 445*)—FORFEITURE—SUICIDE—PUBLIC POLICY.

In the present case, there is no clearly defined public policy opposed to the waiver of the Georgia statute, and there is a clear and vitally important public policy demanding the enforcement of the contract according to its terms and the intention of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1152-1158; Dec. Dig. § 445.*]

10. INSURANCE (§ 146*)—CONSTRUCTION—CONSTRUCTION AGAINST INSURER.

If any doubt should exist in regard to the construction of the contract of insurance, the doubt should be resolved in favor of the insured, and the policy should be liberally construed in favor of the validity of the contract and against the insurance company which wrote the policy, and which is presumed to know the Georgia statute, the benefits of which it has waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 292-298; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

11. INSURANCE (§ 646*)—ACTIONS ON POLICY—BURDEN OF PROOF—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

When the insurance company defends upon the ground of suicide, the burden is upon the company to establish such contention by a preponderance of the evidence. While the authorities are not uniform upon the question, the weight of authority seems to hold that the presumption against suicide is not overcome by the introduction at the trial of the proofs of death in one of the affidavits composing which the cause of death is stated to be suicide. It is a matter of common knowledge that proofs of death are made under conditions of haste to comply with the company's requirements, and under circumstances not conducive to safe conclusions.

12. INSURANCE (§§ 445, 646*)—ACTION ON POLICY—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

The insured died after the expiration of one year from the issuance of the policy, the terms of which are not void as against public policy, and hence the trial court properly directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. §§ 445, 646.*]

Conyers, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Covington; W. H. Whaley, Judge.

Action by J. G. Durden, guardian, against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. To a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error, and plaintiff files a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment affirmed on main bill of exceptions, and cross-bill dismissed.

Jas. H. Gilbert and Rogers & Knox, for plaintiff in error. Napier & Cox, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. This is a suit upon a policy of life insurance issued by the plaintiff in error upon the life of Mattie L. Durden, brought by the defendant in error as guardian for the beneficiaries named in the policy. The answer of plaintiff in error set up various defenses, only one of which is to be considered here under the evidence, viz., that the insured committed suicide, whereby plaintiff in error was discharged from liability under the policy, thus claiming the protection afforded by section 2500 of the Civil Code of 1910. At the trial defendant in error made out his prima facie case by proof of the guardianship, and of the insurance contract, and rested. Plaintiff in error introduced in evidence the application for insurance and the proofs of death made to it by defendant in error, as alleged in his petition, and also rested. Defendant in error offered no further evidence. The case being thus closed, plaintiff in error moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor, upon the ground that the proof of death, uncontradicted, showed that the insured had committed suicide, and therefore plaintiff in error, by force of Civ. Code 1910, § 2500, was released from liability under the policy. The motion was denied, and the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff below.

[1] 1. After an exhaustive search, we have been unable to find an adjudicated case in any jurisdiction upon the controlling point in this case, and hence the conclusion must be reached from premises, most of which fortunately are well established and comparatively uniform. As we view the matter the correct conclusion depends upon whether an insurance company may by contract waive the benefits of section 2500 of the Civil Code 1910, and whether the contract of insurance in the present case constitutes such a waiver. It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that such a waiver would be void and of no effect, even if attempted, as against public policy; that such contracts, if allowed, would encourage suicide, and would result in legalizing insurance against self-destruction. "A waiver is a voluntary relinquishment of a known right, benefit, or advantage, which, except for such waiver, the party would otherwise have enjoyed." Kennedy v. Manry, 6 Ga. App. 819, 66 S. E. 31.

[2] 2. A person may lawfully waive the benefit of a statutory provision where the rights of third parties are not involved, unless such waiver violates public policy. 9 Cyc. 480.

[3] 3. The only authentic and admissible evidence of public policy of a state are its Constitutions, laws, and judicial decisions. As the habits, opinions, and wants of the people vary with the times, so public policy may change with them. So, because these habits, opinions, and wants are different in different places, what may be against public policy in one state or country may not be so in another. "It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void as being against public policy, because, if there is one thing which more than another public policy requires, it is that men of full age and of competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by the courts of justice. Therefore you have this paramount public policy to consider—that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract." 9 Cyc. 482, 483, and note. The provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 4253 et seq., should not be enlarged without convincing and conclusive reasons. In the case of Phoenix Insurance Co. v. Clay, 101 Ga. 332, 28 S. E. 854, 65 Am. St. Rep. 307, Chief Justice Simmons has forcefully summed the whole matter up in these words: "It is well settled that contracts will not be avoided by the courts as against public policy, except where the case is free from doubt, and where an injury to the public interest clearly appears."

[4] 4. In a suit by the beneficiaries against a life insurance company, the policy and such papers as are made a part thereof must be looked to in order to ascertain upon what terms the parties agreed, and what are the rights and liabilities of each. Civ. Code 1910, § 2471; Mass. Life Ass'n v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 268, 30 S. E. 918, 42 L. R. A. 261.

[5] 5. "Death by suicide * * * releases the insurer from the obligation of his contract." Civ. Code 1910, § 2500. Suicide is intentional self-destruction by one who is sane. If one is insane, his self-destruction cannot legally be suicide, nor is self-destruction legally suicide when due to accident. The law never presumes suicide from the fact of self-destruction alone; but, upon the contrary, it does presume that death ensues from natural causes. Life Ass'n v. Waller, 57 Ga. 535; Jenkins v. National Union, 118 Ga. 588, 45 S. E. 449. Self-destruction is never a legal presumption. The fact that the insured committed suicide is not of itself evidence of insanity. Upon the contrary, where it is shown that the insured committed suicide, the law in this state, as well as in most other states, presumes sanity. Merritt v. Cotton States Life Ins. Co., 55

Ga. 103. Were this question not settled in Georgia, the writer would have no hesitation in holding that suicide is itself evidence of an unbalanced mind. 4 Wigmore, Ev. § 2500 (c). "So strong is the instinctive love of life in the human breast, so uniform the efforts of men to preserve their existence, that suicide cannot be presumed. It is contrary to the general conduct of mankind." Travelers' Insurance Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 681, 8 Sup. Ct. 1360, 32 L. Ed. 308; Connecticut Mutual v. Akens, 150 U. S. 475, 14 Sup. Ct. 155, 37 L. Ed. 1148. In Buchanan v. Buchanan, 103 Ga. 92, 29 S. E. 609, Justice Cobb said: "Self-destruction is a circumstance tending to show mental disorder, but it is not conclusive proof of its existence."

[6] 6. Where the policy contained the clause, "the company shall not be liable hereunder in the event of the insured's death by his own act, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year after the issuance of the policy," the benefit of Code section 2500 was waived, unless such waiver was against public policy. If it is established that the insured came to his death by his own intentional act, nothing else appearing, it is presumed that the act was that of a sane man. Consequently it becomes necessary to determine what effect the clause just quoted has upon Civ. Code 1910, § 2500, which itself has reference only to intentional self-destruction by one who is sane. The clause referred to may be divided into two parts, one having reference to the act of one when sane, and the other having reference to the act of one when insane; and, eliminating that part which has reference to an insane act for present purposes, the clause would read as follows: "The company shall not be liable hereunder in the event of insured's death by his own act during the period of one year after the issuance of the policy." Thus it will be seen that the company was dealing directly and specifically in the policy itself with the matter of self-destruction by one sane at the time for its own protection, and presumably for the purpose of securing business, and entered into a contract which provided that the company should not be liable if the insured died by his own act within a period of one year. The company is presumed to have been aware of the provision of Civ. Code 1910, § 2500, and, unless it was the purpose of the company in this contract to waive the benefit of said code section, the language employed would have been redundant. In construing the contract, the intention is to be collected, not from detached parts of the instrument, but from the whole of it. And all parts of the writing, and every word in it, will, if possible, be given effect. 9 Cyc. 579, 580. No word in a contract is to be treated as a redundancy, if any meaning reasonable and consistent with other parts can be given to it. Id. 583.

[7] 7. If one should procure life insurance upon a false promise, made to the insurer at the time of making the contract, that he would not commit suicide, when, in fact, it was his intention at the time so to do, it would be a fraud, entering into the consideration and into the procurement of the contract, which would render the contract void and against public policy, irrespective of section 2500 of the Civil Code of 1910.

[8] 8. In the absence of such a fraudulent intent at the time of making the contract, it would be a fraud on the public and against public policy to declare a policy such as is referred to above void as against the beneficiaries, when the insured did live up to the terms of his contract. Supreme Lodge, etc., v. Trebbe, 74 Ill. App. 545; Campbell v. Supreme Conclave, 66 N. J. Law, 274, 49 Atl. 550, 54 L. R. A. 576; Supreme Conclave v. Miles, 92 Md. 613, 48 Atl. 845, 84 Am. St. Rep. 528. As a matter of public policy it is of great importance to hold the parties to a contract voluntarily made, especially when death has removed one of the parties and closed his lips upon the questions raised by the company when sued for the amount of the policy. When a contract grows immediately out of and is connected with an illegal or immoral act, a court of justice will not lend its aid to enforce it. But a contract may be valid, notwithstanding it is remotely connected with an independent illegal transaction, which, however, it is not designed to aid or promote. Phoenix Insurance Co. v. Clay, 101 Ga. 332, 333, 28 S. E. 853, 65 Am. St. Rep. 307. The record in the present case does not disclose anything to indicate an intention on the part of the insured at the time of making the contract to die by her own hand. "If performance by an insurer is in general terms conditioned on the death of the insured, there seems no valid reason why death by committing suicide should not be included; and such is the general doctrine." Cooke, Life Ins. § 41. A contract of life insurance is not a contract of indemnity, and there is no force in any argument derived from contracts of indemnity. "Granting the inherent wrongfulness of suicide, which is matter for the moralist rather than the judge, the doctrine derived from contracts of indemnity falls when applied thereto. No one in this world can derive a benefit by his own death. By that final event all earthly profit ends for him to whom it comes. He is for this life equally beyond gain and loss, and to him the rules that govern mundane intercourse become no longer applicable. Those who derive the benefit will have done no wrong. But it is said that suicide is a fraud on the insurer. To procure insurance with intent to commit suicide is a fraud on the insurer that should defeat recovery at the option of the insurer, and, with all the incidents of a rescission, will avoid the contract, even as against beneficiaries or assignees. Smith v. National Benevolent Society, 123 N. Y. 85, 25 N. E. 197, 9 L. R. A. 616. But to argue that suicide, not previously intended, is such a fraud as to defeat recovery, is to beg the very question of what is the contract; and the argument assumes that insurance rates are fixed upon a basis excluding death by suicide, while, as we have seen, the contrary must be the case, for the experience tables include all forms of death. Moreover, it would be next to impossible to fasten the fraudulent intent." Campbell v. Supreme Conclave Improved Order Heptasophs, 66 N. J. Law, 274, 49 Atl. 550, 54 L. R. A. 576. So far as the writer has been able to discover, every case holding a contrary doctrine has been based upon the case of Ritter v. Mutual Life Insurance Co., 169 U. S. 139, 18 Sup. Ct. 300, 42 L. Ed. 693, as, for instance, the case of Hopkins v. Northwestern Life Insurance Co. (C. C.) 94 Fed. 729, where a United States Circuit Court, being bound by the Ritter Case, held likewise. A careful examination of the Ritter Case will disclose the fact that the proof was plenary that the insurance was procured with intent to commit suicide.

[9] 9. In the present case there is no clearly defined public policy opposed to the waiver of the Georgia statute. In Georgia, as well as in most of the states of the American Union, suicide is not a crime. Formerly, by the common law of England, the penalty attached to an act of suicide consisted in giving the body of the criminal an ignominious burial in the highway, and in the forfeiture of his lands and chattels to the king; but the law was later altered, so that now the only consequence following an act of self-destruction is the denial of Christian burial. In this country there is generally neither the forfeiture of goods nor other penalty attached to suicide. The Athenian law provided for cutting off the hand which committed the act. Under the Massachusetts act of 1660 (Colonial Laws [Ed. 1672] p. 137), suicides were denied the privilege of Christian burial, and were directed to be buried in the highway, with a cart load of stones laid upon the grave, "as a brand of infamy." 37 Cyc. 521, 522.

[10] 10. If the policy is so drawn as to require interpretation, and to be fairly susceptible of two different constructions, the one will be adopted that is most favorable to the insured. Thompson v. Insurance Co., 136 U. S. 287-297, 10 Sup. Ct. 1019, 34 L. Ed. 408. Deemer, J., in Goodwin v. Provident Savings Life Ass'n, 97 Iowa, 226, 66 N. W. 157, 32 L. R. A. 473, 59 Am. St. Rep. 411, uses the following language, which is quoted with approval by Justice Cobb in the case of Mass. Life Ass'n v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 279, 30 S. E. 928 (42 L. R. A. 261): "The tenets established for the guidance of courts in such matters are well understood, and no one is better established than that in all cases the policy must be liberally construed in favor of the assured, so as not to defeat, without a plain necessity, his claim for indemnity." This was a case in which the company defended itself on the ground of suicide by the insured.

[11] 11. When the insurance company defends upon the ground of suicide, the burden is upon the company to establish such contention by a preponderance of the evidence. While the authorities are not uniform upon the question, the weight of authority seems to hold that the presumption against suicide and in favor of death from natural causes is not overcome by the introduction at the trial of the proofs of death, or even of the verdict of a coroner's jury. 25 Cyc. 930, 931; Union Mut. v. Payne, 105 Fed. 172, 45 C. C. A. 193; Supreme Lodge v. Beck, 94 Fed. 751, 36 C. C. A. 467; Goldsmith v. Mutual Life, 102 N. Y. 486, 7 N. E. 408. Contra, see Spruill v. Northwestern, 120 N. C. 141, 27 S. E. 89; Newark Mutual v. Newton, 22 Wall. 32, 22 L. Ed. 793. In the present case the cause of death is stated to be suicide in one of the affidavits composing the proofs of death. It is a matter of common knowledge that proofs of death are made under conditions of haste, for the purpose of complying with the rules of the company, and are generally made under circumstances which are not conducive to accuracy. The conclusions are frequently stated from imperfectly formed views, and frequently from the statements of others.

[12] 12. The insured in the present case died after the expiration of one year from the issuance of the policy. There is nothing to indicate a fraudulent intent at the time of making the contract upon the part of the insured. The construction of the policy under the plain requirements of the law unquestionably shows a waiver of the benefits of the Georgia statute by the insurance company; and, such waiver not being void as against public policy, the trial court properly directed a verdict for the plaintiff. This is true independently of the legal presumption that the trial court was without error in the judgment rendered.

From the above it follows that the judgment on the main bill of exceptions must be affirmed, and, inasmuch as the result of this is to leave the verdict and judgment below undisturbed, the cross-bill of exceptions is dismissed.

Judgment affirmed on main bill of exceptions; cross-bill dismissed.

Judges S. P. GILBERT, Z. A. LITTLE-JOHN, and C. B. CONYERS, of the superior courts, were designated by the Governor and presided in these cases in place of the judges of the Court of Appeals, all of whom were disqualified.

CONYERS, J. (dissenting). 1. In my opinion both sound reason and the weight of authority are against the conclusion that an effective waiver resulted from the language of the contract. This would be true, I think, even if there were no positive declaration of our Legislature upon the subject. As Mr. Justice Harlan says in the Ritter Case, 169 U. S. 154, 18 Sup. Ct. 305, 42 L. Ed. 693: "A contract the tendency of which is to endanger the public interest or injuriously affect the public good, or which is subversive of sound morality, ought never to receive the sanction of a court of justice or be made the foundation of its judgment. If, therefore, a policy taken out by the person whose life is insured, and in which the sum named is made payable to himself, his executors, administrators, or assigns, expressly provided for the payment of the sum stipulated when or if the assured in sound mind took his own life, the contract, even if not prohibited by statute, would be held to be against public policy, in that it tempted or encouraged the assured to commit suicide in order to make provision for those dependent upon him or to whom he was indebted." But, aside from this, our Legislature (Civil Code 1910, § 2500) has declared such a contract illegal. This is a positive and long-established declaration of the policy of the state. I cannot believe that in enacting this principle of law the Legislature had in mind the rights of individuals that could be waived by contract. In fact, it was not dealing with private rights at all, but with the public welfare; and the principle announced is a sound moral timber in the social structure of the state. An implied waiver is not more effective than an express contract, and therefore I think it unnecessary to decide whether a waiver would or would not result from language such as is used in the contract.

2. The proofs of death are the mechanical foundation of the plaintiff's suit. Without them, under the contract, his suit could not be maintained. He could not, therefore, object to their introduction in evidence by the defendant. They showed that the cause of death was suicide, and there was no further evidence upon the subject by either party. The fact that the proofs of death were made hastily and without forethought would not affect their character as admissions against the plaintiff's interest, requiring from him a showing to the contrary if they were untrue.

While, if it were an open question, I might hold otherwise, our Supreme Court has held in Merritt v. Insurance Co., 55 Ga. 103 (6), that proof of suicide without more does not authorize a presumption that the deceased was insane at the time of the act. This ruling, though by a partial bench of only two justices, is binding upon this court.

It follows from the above that the judgment of the trial court should be reversed on the main bill, and affirmed on the cross-bill of exceptions.

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The uncontradicted testimony demanded the conviction of the defendant, so far as the evidence in any criminal case can ever be said to demand a conviction.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 768*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTIES OF JUROR.

There was no error in the court's charging the jury as follows: "It is unlawful, under the laws of Georgia, to keep on hand at one's place of business spirituous, alcoholic, malt, and intoxicating liquors. You and I form part of the judicial system of the state, and are not concerned, in any way, with the propriety, wisdom, or policy of the legislative branch of the government in passing this law. Sufficient it is for you and me to know it is the law of Georgia, and that, as a part of the judicial branch of the law of Georgia, it is our duty to enforce the law as we find the law written; and in the enforcement of the law we carry with that the term, not only the conviction of the guilty, but the exoneration and justification of the innocent who may be charged with a violation of that law." Nor was the following instruction erroneous: "In this case you are not concerned in any way with the result or effect of your verdict, just as long as you, as jurors under your oaths, know and believe that that verdict is the truth of the case based upon a consideration of the evidence adduced upon the trial of the case, under the rules of law as given you in charge by the presiding judge."

The following instruction is not erroneous: "The accused enters upon his trial with the presumption of innocence in his favor, and that presumption of innocence remains with him throughout the trial, unless it is overcome by evidence sufficiently strong to satisfy your minds and consciences to a reasonable and moral certainty of his guilt, and beyond a reasonable doubt."

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 789*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—"REASONABLE DOUBT."

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 239*)—PROSECUTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

The accused having offered no explanation as to the liquors found in his place of business, the following instruction was not error: "The state contends that certain quantities of rye whisky were found, alcoholic, spirituous, and intoxicating liquors were found, in the grocery store or the 'soft drink' place conducted by the defendant. If that appears to be the truth of the case to a moral and reasonable certainty under the rules of law I have given you in charge, then I charge you the state would be entitled to a verdict of guilty, for no one is entitled to keep on hand at any place of business in this state any quantity of alcoholic, spirituous, or intoxicating liquors." Nor was the following instruction erroneous: "I charge you if you believe that contention [of the state] to a moral and reasonable certainty—that is to say, that alcoholic, spirituous, and intoxicating liquors were found or kept on hand at the time laid in the bill of indictment, or within two years next preceding that time, in the county of Bibb, by the prisoner at the bar, in a nearby room to his place of business, and used in connection with his place of business—if that appears to be the truth of the case to a moral and reasonable certainty, the state would be entitled to a verdict of guilty."

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

The court having charged the jury that they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the liquors found in the defendant's place of business were intoxicating liquors, it was not error to fail to give in totidem verbis an instruction to the effect that, if the liquors found were mere imitations of intoxicating liquors, the defendant should be acquitted.

While it is true, as was held in Stanley v. Stanley, 123 Ga. 122, 51 S. E. 287, that a suit instituted by one as a next friend of a person duly adjudged insane is subject to dismissal upon timely special demurrer (unless amended), if the petition fails to disclose that the insane person has no guardian, and alleges no other reason why it is necessary or proper for him to sue by next friend, rather than by a duly appointed guardian, nevertheless, where a suit is instituted in the name of a person who, pending the trial of the suit, is found to be insane, and it appears from the record that the court itself appointed a guardian ad litem to represent the interests of the plaintiff in the case, and thereupon an amendment was filed, duly making the guardian ad litem a party, special demurrer will not lie on the ground that the petition fails to allege that no legal guardian has been appointed. It is to be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that the court acted lawfully and upon proper showing in appointing the guardian ad litem.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 750*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SPECIFICATIONS.

"An objection that a document offered in evidence was not admissible, because the execution of the same was not proved as required by law, being overruled, the presumption is that the execution was duly proved, unless the contrary affirmatively appears, either by an authentic statement (in the motion for a new trial, usually) that there was no evidence of execution, or by setting out such evidence on that subject as was adduced to the presiding judge. Mere preliminary evidence upon such a question is not for insertion in the brief of evidence requisite to support a motion for a new trial. 5. REQUEST TO CHARGE—GENERAL CHARGE.

The requests to charge, so far as pertinent and in legal form, were covered by the general charge.

6. CHARGE OF COURT—DAMAGES.

The errors assigned as to the charge of the court are not well founded, so far as they are material, except as to the matter of damages, as to which direction is herein given.

7. ADMISSION OF TESTIMONY—EXCEPTIONS.

None of the exceptions to the admission of testimony, in so far as the exceptions themselves are in proper legal form, are meritorious.

8. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

The evidence, though it in some parts smacks of improbability, is not, from a legal standpoint, insufficient to support the verdict, so far as relates to the principal sum recovered.

9. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PROOF OF LOSS—NONSUIT.

There was sufficient evidence of the furnishing of the proofs of loss to avoid a nonsuit.

10. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—VIOLATION OF IRON SAFE CLAUSE.

The proof submitted as to the violation of the "iron safe clause" was not such as to demand a verdict in favor of the defendant.

11. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DAMAGES AGAINST INSURANCE COMPANY—AFFIRMANCE ON CONDITION.

Under all the facts appearing in the record, the verdict is unauthorized, so far as it assesses damages against the insurance company; and the verdict is affirmed, on condition that the plaintiff in the court below will write off from his recovery the amount of the damages.

Error from City Court of Houston County; C. E. Brunson, Judge.

Frank Williams was convicted of selling liquor in violation of law, and brings error. Affirmed.

M. Kunz and R. N. Holtzclaw, for plaintiff in error. R. E. Brown, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Frank Williams was convicted of selling spirituous and intoxicating liquors in violation of what is commonly known as the "prohibition law," and his motion for a new trial was overruled. In his motion he complains of no special legal error, but contends that his conviction was without any evidence, and in his amended motion he asks for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The case was tried by the judge without the intervention of a jury. Two witnesses swore positively that on the day stated in the accusation they were at the house of the accused, and that on that day they, in company with four others, made up a "pot" amounting to $1.40, which they gave to the accused, and for which he then delivered to them whisky and beer. One of the witnesses swore that she had had a fight with the accused that day, and he cut her in the face. This was all the testimony for the state. The four other persons designated by the state's witnesses as having been contributors to the "pot of money" testified that they were present, but denied that they did so contribute, or that they saw any whisky or beer sold by the accused to any one, and testified that they saw no whisky or beer delivered by the defendant to the two witnesses for the state, or to any one else. The defendant in his statement denied that he sold whisky or beer to the two witnesses for the state, or to any one else on the Sunday indicated, or at any other time.

[1] The credibility of the witnesses being for the judge, he accepted the testimony of the state's witnesses as the truth of the transaction, and this court has no power and no inclination to interfere with his discretion in the matter. [2, 3] The newly discovered evidence has two infirmities. (1) There is no affidavit in support of the character of the affiants who are expected to give the newly discovered testimony, and for this reason alone this court would not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial on this ground. Polite v. State, 78 Ga. 347. (2) The alleged newly discovered testimony tends only to discredit and impeach the two witnesses for the state. It would hardly produce a different result on a second trial. It appears, also, that the testimony alleged to be newly discovered could by the exercise of due diligence have been obtained at the first trial as the affiant relied upon to give this evidence was a witness for the defense. The trial was conducted without any legal error. The finding of the court is amply supported by evidence, and the ground asking for a new trial on account of newly discovered evidence is palpably without merit.

Judgment affirmed.

1. LIFE ESTATES (§ 25*)—LEASES BY LIFE TENANT—NOTES FOR RENT.

Where a life tenant rents land for the year, taking a negotiable promissory note for the year's rent, and transfers it for value to a third person, and dies during the year without collecting any of the rent from the undertenant, the transferee of the rent note ordinarily has the right to collect the full amount of the note from the undertenant.

Where a negotiable rent note is transferred by the life tenant to secure the payment of a debt which he owes to the transferee, and the life tenant dies during the year, the transferee ordinarily has the right to recover the full amount due on the note, accounting to the remainderman for any excess of the note over his debt.

3. LIFE ESTATES (§ 25*)—LEASES BY LIFE TENANT—NOTES FOR RENT.

Where an undertenant who gives a rent note is also entitled to the rented land as remainderman, and the transferee of the rent note brings suit thereon against him, the transferee has the right to show that the note was transferred by the life tenant as collateral security, and that the rent note exceeded the amount of the debt which it was transferred to secure, and to limit the recovery by the transferee to the actual amount of his debt against the life tenant.

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; R. H. Lewis, Judge.

Action by J. T. Mitchell against J. J. Rutherford. Judgment for plaintiff for less than amount claimed, and he brings error, and defendant assigns cross-error. Affirmed on both bills of exceptions.

W. O. Mitchell and Jas. Davison, for plaintiff in error. Saml. H. Sibley, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Dickinson had a life estate in land; Rutherford being the remainderman. Dickinson rented the land to Rutherford, taking his two negotiable rent notes for the year 1908. The undertenant went into possession as undertenant. The life tenant died January 20, 1908, before any part of the rent was due. He was indebted to Mitchell for money advanced to him and on an account, and, to secure this indebtedness, he transferred to Mitchell the two negotiable rent notes. When these rent notes matured, Mitchell brought suit against Rutherford, claiming that he was entitled to recover the full amount of the notes, first, because he held them as an innocent purchaser for value before due, and further, because the amount of the indebtedness which he held against Dickinson was greater than the amount of the rent notes transferred to him as collateral security. It was conceded that there was no rent due on the estate of the life tenant; none of the rent having accrued at the date of his death. Rutherford filed a defense, in which he claimed that the rent notes were transferred to Mitchell simply as security for the indebtedness of the life tenant to Mitchell, and that the amount of the notes exceeded the amount of this indebtedness, and that he was entitled to this excess as remainderman. There was conflict in the evidence as to the amount of the indebtedness secured by the transfer of the rent notes. The jury solved the conflict by finding that Mitchell was entitled to recover $100, with interest and attorney's fees, as the actual amount of this indebtedness. Mitchell made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he brings error.

[1] Under the provisions of our Civil Code 1910, § 3669, as construed by this court in Story v. Butt, 2 Ga. App. 119, 58 S. E. 388, and Butt v. Story, 5 Ga. App. 540, 63 S. E. 658, where a life tenant rents land for the year, taking for the rent a negotiable promissory note, and transfers it for value to a third person, and dies during the year, and none of the rent has accrued to the life tenant and none has been collected by him, the transferee of the rent note would ordinarily have the right to collect the full amount of the rent note from the undertenant.

[2] But where this rent note is transferred by the life tenant to secure the payment of a debt which the life tenant owes to the transferee, and the life tenant dies during the year and before any of the rent has accrued to him, the holder of the note would ordinarily have the right to recover from the undertenant the entire amount due on it, accounting to the remainderman for any excess in the amount of the rent note over the debt which he held against the life tenant, and which was secured by the transfer of the note.

[3] In this case the undertenant, Rutherford, being also the remainderman, was entitled to any excess in the rent notes after the full amount of the indebtedness of the transferee against the life tenant had been paid therefrom. Butt v. Story, supra; Hatcher & Co. v. Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, 79 Ga. 547, 5 S. E. 111. Therefore, when Mitchell, as the transferee of the rent notes, brought suit thereon, the re-mainderman, Rutherford, who was also the undertenant and the maker of the notes, had the right to contest in that suit Mitchell's right to the full amount of the note, and to limit the recovery by Mitchell to the actual amount of the indebtedness which the life tenant owed him. Mitchell would only have the right; the notes having been transferred to him as collateral security, to recover on the notes the amount of this indebtedness. He would not be entitled to more than this amount, since he did not buy the notes outright, but received them as collateral security for the indebtedness. And Rutherford, the remainderman, would be entitled, under the law, to any excess in the notes over this indebtedness, and, as he had been sued by Mitchell on the notes, he had the right in that suit to set up his claim to the excess in the rent notes, and if he proved that there was an excess, to have Mitchell's recovery limited accordingly. This we think not only to be the law, but the plain equity and justice of the case.

[4] The evidence was in conflict as to the amount of Mitchell's claim against the life tenant. The jury settled that conflict by giving Mitchell a certain amount in their verdict against Rutherford, and as there was no legal error committed by the trial court this court will not disturb the verdict.

Judgment on both bills of exceptions affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Will Hardaway was convicted of violating the "traveling blind tiger" ordinance. On certiorari his conviction was sustained, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Burton Cloud, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Hardaway was convicted in the recorder's court for violating what is commonly known as the "traveling blind tiger" ordinance, and on certiorari his conviction was sustained. The question presented is only one of fact—Is there any evidence to sustain the finding of the recorder?

Substantially stated, the evidence is as follows: Hardaway was seen by a policeman of the city of Atlanta to deliver a bottle to a white man on a stairway at number 60½ Decatur street. He was also seen by another officer to deliver "something" to another white man in an alley around the corner from 60½ Decatur street, and the white man passed "something" back to him. When arrested and searched, 8½ pints of whisky were found on his person. No objection was made to the legality of this evidence. The accused in his statement explained the possession of the whisky by stating that he had bought 12½ pints of whisky from a "fellow" Saturday night for $3; that when he "was turned out" on Sunday morning he went to get his whisky, where he had left it, at 60½ Decatur street, and he gave the white man a "match," and did not sell to any man on the stairway or in the alley any whisky. The whisky found on the person of the accused was rye and corn whisky. The officers testified that the accused tried to avoid them. This was all the material evidence, and while we cannot say that it is conclusive of guilt, yet there were certainly circumstances which raised more than abated suspicion of guilt, and from which the recorder was warranted in inferring that the accused had violated the "traveling blind tiger" ordinance.

According to the statement of the accused, he had bought, on the Saturday before, 12½ pints of whisky. When he was arrested he had only 8½ pints on his person. He was seen to deliver a bottle to a white man on the stairway at 60½ Decatur street, where he says he left the whisky. It is not unreasonable to presume that this was a bottle of whisky, and that he was not presenting it as a gift to the white man. Going around the corner, he was again seen to give "something" to another white man, and to receive in exchange "something" from the white man. It is reasonable to assume that this "something" was a bottle of whisky, and that the "something" given by the white man to the accused was money for the whisky. He was well equipped in the assortment of his supplies to gratify the taste of customers. He had both corn and rye whisky. He also had it in one-half pints, a quantity that probably would satisfy the thirst of any chance customer; and besides, according to the testimony of the patrolman, his movements indicated that he was endeavoring to avoid the officers.

These facts, taken all together, may have been susceptible of explanation consistent with the innocence of the accused, but this was a matter for determination by the recorder; and, since he saw the witnesses and heard their testimony and the explanation of the accused, he was in a much better position to judge of the probative value of the evidence than this court.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; G. S. Ferguson, Judge.

Action by J. R. Wiley against the Broaddus & Ives Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

It appeared that on the 12th of May, 1906, plaintiff and another sold to defendant "all the pine and gum timber of every description above the size of 12 inches at the base on a certain tract of land"; the written contract of conveyance and sale providing that defendant should have full time to have said timber cut and removed from said land, and extending in any event for such purpose to the full term of three years. The instrument also conveyed to defendant (the grantee) the privilege to have a right of way over the grantors' lands, and to erect thereon necessary tramroads, etc., for the purpose of carrying out the timber; and there was further provision that the grantors were to cut and deliver said timber at the logged of defendant's tramroad, and to be paid therefor at the rate of $4 per thousand, etc. It was admitted that the present plaintiff was the owner of one-half interest in the land and timber and the contract concerning same, and that defendant had acquired the rights and interests of the other parties. There was allegation, with evidence on part of plaintiff, tending to show that plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to cut and deliver all the timber as provided for by the contract, and that defendant, after having received the pay for the greater part of the pine timber, wrongfully, and in breach of the contract, had refused to receive the gum timber, and had torn out and removed the tramroad, etc., to plaintiff's damage. Recovery was resisted on part of defendant, on the ground, chiefly, that the contract only conveyed the timber, giving the right to remove the same in three years, and that no breach thereof was committed in leaving part of the timber on the land. Second. That in any event the damages would be only nominal, as the timber not taken would remain on the land and become property of plaintiff. On issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict: "(1) Were plaintiffs at all times able, ready, and willing, during the term of the contract, to perform the contract as alleged? Answer: Yes. (2) Did defendant fail and refuse to perform the contract on its part as alleged? Answer: Yes. (3) If so, what damage is plaintiff entitled to recover therefor? Answer: $300, being for the plaintiff's half, without interest." Judgment on the verdict, and defendant excepted and appealed.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] There is no reversible error shown in the record. Defendant is right in the position that when one has bought and paid for a lot of growing timber, and same has been conveyed him, with the privilege of removal within a given time, the contract as to the removal is so far unilateral that the purchaser is not obligated to cut and remove the timber. If he fails to do so within the time, his right or estate therein is forfeited, and inures, as a rule, to the owner of the land. We have so held in two cases at the last term. Hornthal v. Howcutt, 154 N. C. 228, 70 S. E. 171; Bateman v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 248, 70 S. E. 474.

[2, 3] But the contract in question here is not of that character. Applying to it the accepted rule of construction "that the intent of the parties as embodied in the entire instrument is the end to be attained, and that each and every part must be given effect, if this can be done by any fair and reasonable interpretation" (Davis v. Frazier, 150 N. C. 451, 64 S. E. 200), a perusal of this entire instrument will disclose that, while it begins by reciting $450 as the consideration, the controlling stipulation of the contract provides that the parties plaintiff were to cut and deliver "said timber" at the logbed, and the parties defendant were to pay for the same the sum of $4 per thousand "feet"; and it is also expressly provided that the $450 first referred to as the consideration was only an advancement on the contract price, and to be accounted for as the timber was delivered. The contract in this instance was therefore bilateral in its obligations, and the verdict has established that there was a breach of same on the part of defendant giving plaintiff a right to recover.

[4] On the issue as to damages, there was testimony from plaintiff tending to show that he had bargained the pine timber at a less price than it was worth by itself, because of the fact that he had sold the gum with it, and this last, which was what defendant had failed and refused to receive, was not by itself worth the contract price, and by reason of the removal of defendant's tramroad was of very little value. There was testimony on part of defendant on this issue in contradiction of that of plaintiff, and also tending to show that plaintiff's damage was not near so much as he claimed; but the question was submitted to the jury under a correct charge, and we find no valid reason for disturbing their verdict. After laying down the general rule of damages and giving special illustration in aid of its application, the court further said: "That will explain what I mean when I say he is to have $4 per thousand, less the value of the timber as it stood upon the ground, whatever you may find that to be, and less whatever you find from the evidence the expense would be to deliver to cut and deliver it to the tramroad, the place stipulated in the contract. But understand that as the plaintiff is not the only one interested in the quantity of timber, he would be entitled to only half, because the other half is not his, and he would not be entitled to recover for that. Something has been said about the character of the timber. I charge you that such timber as was not of any use, of no value, would not be in the contemplation of the parties to the contract, and would not be included in the description of 'all timber,' and yet it would not mean only such timber as was first quality timber; it would mean such timber as could be used and sawed up and put into boards for ordinary purposes for which gum timber can be used by sawmill men." We are of opinion, as stated, that the cause has been fairly and correctly tried, and that the judgment in plaintiff's favor should be affirmed.

No error.

ELECTROVA CO. et al. v. SPRING GARDEN INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 11, 1911.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 139*)—LEGALITY—PUBLIC POLICY.

Where plaintiffs placed a mechanical piano in a house of ill fame to induce the proprietress to purchase it without any other understanding, a fire policy covering the piano which was burned in the house could not be defended on the ground that it was void as against public policy, because in aid of an agreement between plaintiff and the proprietress.

The effect upon the public interest of a fire policy covering a piano placed in a house of ill fame to enable the proprietress to try it and induce her to purchase, because of the illegal nature of the house, is too remote to make the insurance policy void as against public policy.

"Second. If so, what sum, if any, are plaintiffs entitled to recover of the defendant for its destruction by fire, if it was destroyed? Answer: $248.75. Destroyed by fire.

"Third. Was the piano an electric one, played by putting a nickel or dime in the slot? Answer: Yes.

"Fourth. Was said piano at the time it was burned placed by plaintiffs in the house of a woman who kept a house of ill fame for trial with a view of selling the same to the keeper of said house, and with the knowledge that said house was a house of ill fame? Answer: Yes; the day before the fire.

"Fifth. After the fire, did plaintiffs take out of the piano any money put in the slot? Answer: Yes.

BROWN, J. The Electrova Company is a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of a piano which plays tunes by mechanical means when a nickel is inserted in a slot. On August 11, 1909, plaintiff's sales agent, Rackley, placed an instrument in a house of ill fame in Kinston belonging to Mabel Page for trial, with the view to sell it to her. It was not placed there to be operated for plaintiffs, but only with the purpose to induce the proprietress to buy it eventually. About 6 p. m. on April 12th the house caught fire, and the piano was practically destroyed by the flames. The charred body of the piano was opened, and the agent Rackley took out $1.25 in nickels, which had been put in the slot by visitors of the house. On April 12, 1910, in the town of Greenville, the agent, Rackley, took out from defendant's agent there a "floating policy" insuring all plaintiffs' instruments in Greenville and Kinston, effective after 12 o'clock noon that day.

[1, 2] The defense is that the contract of insurance between plaintiffs and defendant was void because the piano had been placed in a house of ill fame with a view to selling it to the proprietress. It is urged that such a transaction is against public policy to such an extent that it avoids the policy of insurance on the piano. The defense has the merit of novelty at least. But we think it must fail for two reasons: First. The theory of the defense is that the piano was insured in aid and furtherance of a contract or agreement entered into between the plaintiffs and Mabel Page, which was against public policy. The defendant fails to establish any contract or agreement of any sort between the plaintiffs and Page. There was no contract or agreement to sell the piano. It was placed in her house only in the hope of a sale. The title and right of possession was never out of the plaintiffs. They had the right to remove it at any moment, and by legal process, if necessary. The instrument was not placed in the house to earn nickels for plaintiffs, although Rackley found same in its remains. But, if it had been placed there as slot machines frequently are placed in public places to earn nickels for the owner, the plaintiffs would not have thereby forfeited their title to the property. The insurance policy was not taken out in aid and furtherance of a contract and agreement entered into between plaintiffs and Mabel Page, for there was none entered into, moral or immoral. The rule of law which the defendant invokes applies only to executory contracts or agreements which are to be performed in the future, and not to transactions which are past and closed. Brown v. Kinsey, 81 N. C. 245. Second. The effect upon the public interest under the facts of this case is too remote entirely to justify a court in refusing its aid to plaintiffs to enforce the payment of the policy.

[3] The reason that some contracts and agreements are declared void as against public policy is because the enforcement of them by the courts would have a direct tendency to injure the public good. The law does not consider the advantage or interests of either party to the contract, but acts only from considerations of the public good. Harrell v. Watson, 63 N. C. 454; Brown v. Kinsey, supra; Collins v. Blanton, 1 Smith, Ldg. cases, 153. It has been said by learned judges and text-writers that a court should declare a contract void as against public policy only when the case is clear and free from doubt, and the injury to the public is substantial, and not theoretical or problematical. Navigation Co. v. Dumas, 181 Fed. 782, 104 C. C. A. 641; Cox v. Hughes, 10 Cal. App. 553, 102 Pac. 956. Where the contract or agreement sought to be enforced has no direct connection with the illegal act, but is collateral to it, then the contract is not tainted or affected by the illegal act. The principle of law is thus stated by Chief Justice Marshall: "Where a contract grows immediately out of and is connected with an illegal or immoral act, a court of justice will not lend its aid to enforce it." "But if the promise be entirely disconnected with the illegal act, and is founded on a new consideration, it is not affected by the act, although it was known to the party to whom the promise was made, and although he was the contriver and conductor of the illegal act." Again, the Chief Justice expresses the same principle in simpler language, when he says: "A new contract, founded on a new consideration, although in relation to property respecting which there had been unlawful transactions between the parties, is not itself unlawful." Armstrong v. Toler, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.) 258, 6 L. Ed. 468. Where the connection between the illegal act and the agreement sought to be enforced is not direct but remote, the latter will be upheld. The decision of this court in McKesson v. Jones, 66 N. C. 284, is founded in the principles laid down by Chief Justice Marshall, and recognized in the English courts by Melish, L. J., in Taylor v. Bowen, 1 Q. B. D. 291. This was an action on a note given for the rent of land leased for the purpose of raising food for laborers in the employ of the Confederate government. In the opinion

Mr. Justice Rodman says: "In the present case the aid given the Rebellion was much more indirect. It was, at best, two steps further off. It was not a sale of military materials, nor even a sale of provisions to laborers making material, but a lease of land upon which provisions might be raised, which might be applied to feed laborers engaged in an unlawful occupation." Again, we read from the same case: "It is possible to foresee and calculate the direct consequences of an act. If we attempt to follow it out into its direct and more remote consequences, our reasoning becomes soon uncertain, and after a few steps altogether unsatisfactory. When we confine ourselves to direct consequences, we feel that we are treading on tolerably firm ground; but, if we go further, there is no telling into what calculations of remote and merely possible consequences we may not be compelled to plunge." In Powell v. Smith, 66 N. C. 401, this court held that where a principal and surety gave a note for a consideration against public policy, and the surety paid same at the request of the principal, the principal giving a new note to the surety, the latter note could be collected. In Poin-dexter v. Davis, 67 N. C. 114, Reade, J., says: "The facts in this case are that the county had contracted a debt to equip soldiers in the Confederate service, and then contracted this debt to pay that off. The first transaction was clearly in aid of the Rebellion, and for that reason illegal. But how did it aid the Rebellion to pay that debt off? * * * The argument is a refinement, and the illegality too remote." The true test of the illegality of a contract is thus stated by this court in State v. Bevers, 86 N. C. 595. "The principle upon which the courts refuse their aid in such cases is this: No court will lend assistance to one who founds his cause of action upon an illegal act. * * * But to put this principle into operation in any particular case it must appear that the very party who is seeking aid from the court participated in the unlawful purpose. Indeed, it is said that the very test of its application is whether the plaintiff can establish his case otherwise than through the medium of an illegal transaction, to which he was himself a party." It has been also held by other jurisdictions that, if the plaintiff does not require the aid of an illegal transaction to establish his claim, he may recover. In re Bunch Co. (D. C.) 180 Fed. 519, and cases cited; Fruit Association v. Stelling, 141 Cal. 713, 75 Pac. 320.

There are cases which hold that, if this piano had been sold to Mabel Page to enable her to better carry on and conduct a house of ill fame, the seller could not recover in an action for the purchase price.

Fur. Co. v. Van Alstaine, 22 Wash. 670, 62 Pac. 145, 51 L. R. A. 889, 79 Am. St. Rep. 960; Reed v. Brewer, 90 Tex. 148, 37 S. W. 418. Those cases are founded upon the principle we have adverted to, that the plaintiff could not make out his case without resorting to and putting in evidence an illegal transaction. But nowhere can there be found a case, so far as we are advised, which holds that, if Mabel Page had purchased the piano, she could not have lawfully insured it, and recovered the insurance had it been destroyed by fire. It is very generally held to be vicious and in some states it is made a crime for the owner of a house to lease it for immoral purposes. Yet it has never been held that, if the house so leased is insured and destroyed by fire, the owner cannot recover on his policy. There is no direct connection between the immoral or unlawful act of leasing, and the lawful and (so far as the public is concerned) harmless act of insuring. The evil effect upon the public interests is entirely too remote and problematical to avoid the lawful contract of insurance. Fire insurance contracts are recognized by the laws of all civilized nations. They are based upon a cash consideration, and from their very character cannot have an immoral tendency. They are not entered into to promote vice, but solely to secure the owner of property against loss. The contract sued on is based upon a new and cash consideration, and not upon an immoral one. Neither do plaintiffs have to resort to an immoral or illegal transaction to make out their cause of action. How the taking out of this floating policy upon all their pianos in Kinston and Greenville could in any way aid and abet the sale of one of the pianos so insured to Mabel Page is difficult to see. She could derive no benefit from the insurance, and it was therefore no inducement for her to purchase. The moment the piano became her property it lost the protection of the plaintiff's floating policy, and was no longer insured. No public interest is involved, much less injured, by the enforcement of this contract. And we think what is said by the Supreme Court of California in the case cited may well apply to this: "Parties should be careful about making contracts, but, when once made, the courts will not relieve them for light or trivial reasons. Public policy is better served by leaving the parties and their rights to be measured by the terms of their contract."

Upon the issues as answered by the jury the plaintiff, the Electrova Company, is entitled to judgment for $248.75, interest and costs. Let the cause be remanded, with instructions to the superior court of Lenoir county to enter judgment accordingly.

Reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Justice, Judge.

Action by Howard C. Park against W. P. Exum, Jr., and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Plaintiff sued, claiming to be indorsee for value and holder in due course of a negotiable note for $500, given by defendants to McLaughlin Bros. in part obligation for purchase price of a stallion. The deposition of plaintiff was introduced, containing full and direct statement that plaintiff bought the note for full value, and same was duly indorsed to him by the payees before maturity, and without notice of any fraud or other infirmity affecting its validity. The indorsement was denied in the pleadings, and there were also allegations, on the part of defendants, to the effect that there was a breach of warranty on the part of McLaughlin Bros. in the sale; and, further, that the sale was procured by false and fraudulent representations on the part of the said vendors, to defendants' damage. The jury having been impaneled and evidence offered, at the close of the testimony, the court intimated that he would charge the jury that if they found the facts to be as testified in the deposition the plaintiff could recover, to which defendants then and there excepted. Counsel for defendants then stated to the court "that they took the position that there was sufficient evidence to be found in the testimony to go to the jury on the question as to whether the jury believed the evidence of the plaintiff in the action. The court stated he would not allow a verdict to stand in favor of the defendants," this statement being made in the hearing of the jury, and defendants excepted. There was verdict for plaintiff for full amount of the note and interest, judgment according to verdict, and defendants excepted and appealed, alleging errors.

G. V. Cowper and T. C. Wooten, for appellants. McLean, Varser & McLean and Loftin & Dawson, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] Our statute on negotiable instruments (Revisal 1905, § 2208), as applied and construed in several recent decisions of the court, is to the effect that, in order to establish the position of holder in due course, when required to shut off counterclaims and defenses otherwise available, it must be shown that the instrument is complete and regular on its face, and that title thereto was acquired in good faith, and for value before maturity, and without knowledge or notice of fraud or other impeaching circumstance; and, except in case of instruments payable to bearer, when the indorsement is denied, the same must be proved. Myers v. Petty, 153 N. C. 462, 69 S. E. 417; Mayers v. McRimmon, 140 N. C. 640, 53 S. E. 447, 111 Am. St. Rep. 879; Tyson v. Joyner, 139 N. C. 69, 51 S. E. 803. In the present case there was allegation, with evidence on the part of defendants, tending to show that there was a breach of warranty, in the sale on the part of these vendors. On a perusal of the entire testimony, we think there was evidence, tending to show fraud and deceit on their part, inducing the sale and causing damage, under the principles stated in Myers v. Petty, supra; Whitehurst v. Insurance Company, 149 N. C. 273, 62 S. E. 1067; May v. Loomis, 140 N. C. 350, 52 S. E. 728, and cases of like import. The instrument, too, was payable to order, and the indorsement was denied in the pleadings, thus putting on plaintiff, in order to shut off the defenses arising on the testimony, the burden of showing that the instrument had been indorsed, and that he was otherwise a holder in due course. True the deposition of plaintiff, introduced on the trial, contains full and direct statement tending to show that plaintiff was indorsee for value, before maturity, and in all respects a holder of the note in due course, and it may be that his honor was right in intimating that he would charge the jury "that if they found the facts to be as testified to in the deposition there should be a verdict in plaintiff's favor; but in this and every other case, when proof is required to establish a determinative issue, the credibility of the evidence is for the jury, and they must be allowed to consider and pass upon it themselves. We have so held in a case on this very subject (Bank v. Fountain, 148 N. C. 590, 62 S. E. 738), and a new trial was granted in that case, because the court erroneously invaded the province of the jury by telling them that the prima facie case of plaintiff had been restored by the uncontradicted evidence of the president of the bank, etc. The opinion in question quotes with approval from Bank v. Iron Works, 159 Maas 158, 34 N. E. 93, as follows: "In an action on a promissory note, which was defended on the ground that the note had been fraudulently put into circulation by the P. L. Co., a Massachusetts corporation, organized for the purpose of 'doing a brokerage business in commercial paper, stocks, bonds, and other property,' from whom the plaintiff company acquired it, the plaintiff's officers testified that the note was taken by them in good faith and for value before maturity, and the defendant introduced no testimony to contradict these officers. Held, that the defendant was entitled, nevertheless, to go to the jury on the question whether the plaintiff took the note for value and without notice of fraud."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[4, 5] Under the conditions stated, therefore, with the controlling issue to be determined, and involving the credibility of plaintiff's testimony tending to establish it, his honor had no right to say, in the hearing of the jury, "that he would not allow a verdict to stand in favor of defendants." The court has been always swift to enforce obedience to our law, which forbids a presiding judge to express an opinion on the disputed facts of a trial, and under numerous decisions, construing the statute, we must hold this remark of his honor, in the presence of the jury and before verdict, to be reversible error. State v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 508, 62 S. E. 1088; Withers v. Lane, 144 N. C. 184, 56 S. E. 855; State v. Dixon, 75 N. C. 275; Nash v. Morton, 48 N. C. 3. The expression objected to was undoubtedly an inadvertence. From a long, intimate, and much valued association with his honor, when we were at the bar together, and from observation of his work as a judicial officer, the writer knows of a certainty that there is no man or judge who places higher estimate on the value of the trial by jury, or holds deeper conviction that it should now and always be preserved in its fullest integrity. For the error indicated, defendant is entitled to a new trial, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2500, 2501; Dec. Dig. § 982.*]

In the matter of the petition of Leo Hinson, alias Mrs. Ernest Rochelle, for habeas corpus. On certiorari to review a judgment denying the writ. Judgment affirmed.

W. S. O'B. Robinson, Geo. E. Hood, and R. M. Robinson, for petitioner. The Attorney General, opposed.

CLARK, C. J. This is a certiorari in lieu of an appeal to review a judgment denying the discharge of the petitioner on habeas corpus. In re Holley, 154 N. C. 163, 69 S. E. 872. At August term of Wayne, 1910, the petitioner was convicted of retailing spirituous liquors. The entry on the docket is simply: "Judgment of the court that the defendant be imprisoned in the county jail for eight (8) months." The judge below in this proceeding finds that the trial judge said to the defendant that, if she would leave the county of Wayne and not return, she would not be compelled to serve the sentence of imprisonment, and directed the clerk of the court verbally not to issue capias to carry into effect the judgment pronounced until 15 days after the adjournment of the court. Within that time the petitioner left the county of Wayne, and took up her abode in the adjoining county of Wilson, where she abided until after the expiration of the eight months, when she returned to Wayne. Thereupon she was taken in arrest upon the capias issued by the clerk as directed by the trial judge 15 days after the adjournment of said court, and was imprisoned in the county jail in execution of the judgment above set out. The petitioner being in jail under a judgment of the court, his honor properly refused to discharge her.

[1] If the judge had suspended judgment and afterwards in accordance with the terms thereof had passed sentence, it would have been valid. State v. Hilton, 151 N. C. 687, 65 S. E. 1011.

[2] The judge might in his discretion have passed judgment to begin at some future time (State v. Hamby, 126 N. C. 1066, 35 S. E. 614), as, for instance, to begin 15 days after the adjournment of the court. But he did neither of these things. He did less.

[3] He rendered an absolute judgment of imprisonment and simply directed the clerk not to issue capias thereon for 15 days. This was in his discretion. This is sometimes done to give the defendant time to go home and arrange his affairs. In this case the kind-hearted judge, doubtless on account of the sex of the defendant, purposely gave her an opportunity to avoid execution of her sentence. In State v. Hatley, 110 N. C. 522, 14 S. E. 751, the court said that "such course is not infrequent, and, though dictated by the best intentions to benefit the public, as well as offenders, is not to be commended," adding that the court had no power to pass a sentence of banishment, and that the judgment of the court could not be fairly so construed, and that, if the defendant returned after the time specified, capias should be issued to execute the judgment. The judgment of the court herein is unequivocal. The opportunity which the withholding of the capias afforded the defendant to escape was not a decree of banishment. There was nothing requiring her to leave. If she left, it was of her own free will and accord, and was legally a flight from justice. The defendant cannot plead her own wrong in leaving the jurisdiction of the court by her own voluntary act as a protection against a legal sentence.

The distinguished counsel who represented the defendant attempted to distinguish this case from State v. Hatley, supra, on the ground that in this case the defendant remained in the adjoining county for the full eight months of the sentence. There is no statute of limitations in such case. The position of counsel could be sustained only on the ground that eight months sojourn in another county is the equivalent of eight months imprisonment in the county jail of Wayne. His loyalty to his home is like that of "the Argive, who, in dying, remembers sweet Argos."† His position, if submitted as a proposition of fact to a Wayne county jury, might possibly not be altogether hopeless, but we cannot sustain it as a proposition of law.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Ward, Judge.

Action by Kate M. Wells against Julia F. Wells and others for distribution of the estate of W. D. Wells, deceased. From judgment of the clerk distributing one-half of the personal estate to Julia F. Wells, the other defendants appealed to the superior court, wherein that judgment was reversed, and defendant Julia F. Wells appeals. Judgment overruling the clerk reversed.

Aycock & Winston, Geo. R. Ward, and Stevens, Beasley & Weeks, for appellant. D. L. Ward, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. W. D. Wells, deceased, left surviving him a widow, who, it is admitted, is entitled to half of the personal estate, and his mother, who claims to be entitled to the other half of the personal estate, also two sisters and a brother, who claim that they are entitled to share equally with the mother in that half of the estate; that is, they contend that the mother, the brother, and the two sisters is entitled, each, to one-eighth.

[1] The distribution of the personal estate of an intestate is entirely statutory. Rev. 1905, § 132 (3), provides: "If there be no child nor legal representative of a deceased child, then half of the estate shall be allotted to the widow, and the residue be distributed to every of the next of kin of the intestate, who are in equal degree, and to those who legally represent them." This language is so explicit that it should leave no room for doubt. The next of kin of the intestate in this case is his mother. His brother and sisters are one degree farther removed. It follows, therefore, that the mother is entitled to half of the personalty. The brother and sisters rely upon Rev. § 132, subsec. 6: "If, after the death of the father and in the lifetime of the mother, any of his children shall die intestate, without wife or children, every brother or sister, and the representatives of them, shall have an equal share with the mother of the deceased child." But this case does not come within that section for the intestate left a widow. It does come within the state of facts provided in subsection 3, above quoted. It may be asked why the Legislature gives the mother only a child's share when the intestate leaves no widow, and gives her as next of kin half of the personalty if the intestate leaves a widow. Such is the plain letter of the law, and we do not have to supply reasons for legislative action. But it may be surmised that the difference is due to this: That, when the intestate leaves no wife or children, the entire estate is to be divided, and therefore the children share in it; whereas, when the intestate leaves a widow, there is only half the estate left, and the statute gives that to all who are the next of kin "in an equal degree." Another reason for subsection 6 is that, under Rev. subsec. 5, formerly on the death of the intestate without leaving widow or children, the entire personalty would have gone to the father as the next of kin because ex jure mariti he would take his wife's share. Subsection 6, carrying out the same idea, provided that in case of the death of the son, leaving neither widow nor children, the personalty should be distributed equally between the children and the mother, just as if the property had gone to the father and was to be distributed as his personalty under Rev. § 132, subsec. 2.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

† Dulces moriens reminiscitur Argos. Verg. 10 Æn. 733.

[2] It would be useless to cite cases from other jurisdictions having statutes more or less similar to ours or reason by analogy from decisions on a somewhat different state of facts. As already said, we cannot surmise as to the reasons for the statute. When, as here, the statute is plain, it is the duty of the court to observe it as written. Lex scripta est is sufficient for us. In this case we have not the state of facts provided for by Rev. § 132, subsec. 6, and we do have the state of facts provided for by Rev. § 132, subsec. 3. The clerk, therefore, properly held that the widow is entitled to one half of the personalty of the intestate, and that the mother of the deceased as "next of kin" is entitled to the other half.

The judgment overruling the clerk is reversed.

It is admitted that is the sum due plaintiff by defendant for rent and towels. The defendant offered certain evidence tending to establish a counterclaim, which was excluded, and defendant excepted.

Abell & Ward, for appellant. F. H. Brooks, for appellee.

BROWN, J. Plaintiff leased, by contract in writing, to defendant its hotel, including the waterworks and connections used exclusively to supply it with water. This proceeding was brought to eject defendant and recover balance of rent due plaintiff. Defendant pleaded a counterclaim, viz., that under the rental contract between the plaintiff and the defendant the plaintiff rented to the defendant the waterworks and all connections thereto belonging. It was the duty of the plaintiff to keep said waterworks and connections in proper repair and in good condition, so that a supply of water could be had at all times for necessary use in said hotel; that on account of the carelessness and negligence of the plaintiff in not keeping said waterworks and connections in proper repair and in good condition, thereby cutting off the water supply necessary for use in the said hotel, and in the failure to furnish water necessary for the same, the defendant has been damaged. The defendant offered evidence tending to prove that the waterworks and pipes got out of order during her tenancy, that plaintiff neglected to repair them, and that defendant was damaged thereby. His honor excluded the evidence upon the ground that it was defendant's duty to repair the waterworks in the house during her tenancy, and not plaintiff's.

We have examined the written lease with care, and are unable to find any covenant in it by which the landlord binds himself to keep the property or the waterworks during the lease in repair. Whether the tenant obligated himself to do it is immaterial.

[1] Without express stipulation in a lease, the law implies a covenant of quiet enjoyment upon the part of the landlord, and, if the tenant be rightfully evicted by another, he may recover damages, and this covenant extends to water and sewerage connections existing at date of lease. Huggins v. Waters, 154 N. C. 444, 70 S. E. 842.

[2] Under the civil law, in case of tenancies for short terms, the landlord was under implied obligation, without special agreement, to keep the premises in repair. 4 Kent, Com. 110; Felton v. Cincinnati, 95 Fed. 336, 37 C. C. A. 88; Viterbo v. Friedlander, 120 U. S. 707, 7 Sup. Ct. 962, 30 L. Ed. 776. But under the common law it is well settled that, in the absence of any agreement between the parties, the landlord was under no obligation to his tenant to keep the demised premises in repair.

[3] The common law considers such a lease as the one in evidence as the grant of an estate for years, to which the lessee takes title. The lessee is bound to pay the stipulated rent notwithstanding injury by flood, fire, or other external cause. It required a statute of the state to relieve the lessee where the property is destroyed by fire. By the common law the lessor is under no implied covenant to repair, or even that the premises shall be fit for the purpose for which they are rented. 3 Kent, Com. 465; Brown, Leg. Max. (3d Ed.) 213, 214; Fowler v. Bott, 6 Mass. 63; Doupe v. Genin, 45 N. Y. 119, 6 Am. Rep. 47; 2 McAdam on Landlord & Ten. § 383; 1 Taylor on Landlord & Ten. § 327; Viterbo v. Friedlander, supra. Chancellor Kent states the distinction between the civil and common law as follows: "The Roman law made some compensation to the lessee for the shortness of his five-year lease, for it gave him a claim upon the lessor for reimbursement for his reasonable improvements. The landlord was bound to repair, and the tenant was discharged from the rent if he was prevented from reaping and enjoying the crops by an extraordinary and unavoidable calamity, as tempests, fire, or enemies. In these respects the Roman lessee had the advantage of the English tenant, for, if there be no agreement or statute applicable to the case, the English landlord is not bound to repair, or to allow the tenant for repairs made without his authority; and the tenant is bound to pay the rent, and to repair at his own expense, to avoid the charge of permissive waste." "The rule of caveat emptor applies to leases," says the Encyclopædia, "and the landlord is not even under an implied obligation to remedy defects in the demised premises existing at the time of the demise. It follows, therefore, in the absence of any agreement on the part of the landlord to repair, a tenant cannot recover from the landlord the cost of repairs made by him," etc. 18 Am. & Eng. p. 215. In regard to waterworks, it has been held in New York that, when water pipes are arranged for an entire building occupied by different tenants, it is the duty of the landlord to keep the pipes in repair, or the failure to repair may amount to a constructive eviction. Bank v. Newton, 76 N. Y. 616. But the Massachusetts court holds that a landlord is under no implied obligation to keep in repair water pipes used exclusively in carrying water to the part of the building demised to the tenant, and therefore is not liable to such tenant for leakage from such pipes. McKeon v. Cutter, 156 Mass. 296, 31 N. E. 389.

Upon a review of the record, we find no error.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 38*)—RIGHT TO LIEN—"LABORERS."

Under Revisal 1905, § 2016, giving laborers and mechanics a lien for work done upon buildings, a laborer or mechanic is one engaged in manual labor or onerous work with his hands, and so one superintending the erection of a building is not entitled to a lien for his services.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 36*)—RIGHT TO LIENS—"MECHANICS."

Under Revisal 1905, § 2016, giving mechanics and laborers lien for work done upon buildings, an architect who furnished plans and specifications for a building is not entitled to a lien, having neither performed labor upon it, nor being a "mechanic"; the term as used in the lien laws meaning a person skilled in the practical use of tools (citing 5 words and Phrases, p. 4457).

3. MECHANICS' LIENS, (§ 36*)—RIGHT TO LIENS—"MATERIALS."

Plans and specifications drawn by an architect for the erection of a building are not "materials," within the purview of Revisal 1905, § 2016, giving a mechanic's lien upon buildings for materials furnished.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 82*)—DISABILITIES OF COVERTURE—CONTRACTS.

A contract made before the passage of Acts 1911, c. 109, providing that married women shall have power to contract, whereby a married woman agreed to compensate an architect for drawing the plans and specifications and overseeing the construction of a building, is void.

Acts 1911, c. 109, providing that married women "shall be" authorized to contract, and that the act "shall be" in force from and after its ratification, is wholly prospective in its terms, but even were the language doubtful it should be construed as prospective.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by B. H. Stephens against Sallie M. S. Hicks and husband. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to his complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kenan & Stacy, for appellant. Rountree & Carr, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action is brought by the plaintiff, an architect, against the defendants. Mrs. Sallie M. S. Hicks and her husband, to recover of the feme defendant damages alleged to be due for a breach of a contract, by the terms of which the plaintiff agreed to prepare and furnish plans and specifications for an apartment house, to be erected by her, for which he was to receive $700, and was actually paid the sum of $350, and he further agreed to superintend the construction of the building, as her architect, for the sum of $300, which she has prevented him from doing. Plaintiff seeks also to enforce a mechanic's and laborer's lien upon the property. The defendant demurred to the complaint, and plaintiff appealed from the judgment sustaining the demurrer.

[1] Whatever may be law, as declared in other jurisdictions, this court has thoroughly settled the principle that a mechanic or laborer, within the meaning of our lien laws, is one who performs manual labor; one regularly employed at some hard work; or one who does work that requires little skill, as distinguished from an artisan. Whitaker v. Smith, 81 N. C. 340, 31 Am. Rep. 503. In that case, Justice Ashe, for the court, thus explained the lien law of our state by the circumstances which caused its enactment: "A very large proportion of the laboring population of the state had just recently been released from thralldom and thrown upon their own resources, perfectly ignorant of the common business transactions of social life, and this provision of the Constitution, and the acts passed to carry it into effect, were intended to give protection to that class of persons who were totally dependent upon their manual toil for subsistence. The law was designed exclusively for mechanics and laborers." And it was held that an overseer is not a mechanic or laborer under our lien law, and is not entitled to a lien on the building and premises, where his work is done or labor performed for the price or value of his services. The case of Cook v. Ross, 117 N. C. 193, 23 S. E. 252, is quite as much to the point, for there it was held that one who, under a contract, assists the owner of a mill in purchasing machinery and superintends the installation of the same and the repairing of the mill, so as to put it in proper condition for the manufacture of yarns, was in no view justified by our statute a mechanic or laborer. "He was superintendent of the work which was done," says the court, "but was in no sense employed as a laborer by the day to do toilsome and manual labor. His business, under the agreement, was not to labor with his hands, but to oversee those who did the work in subjection to his authority." So it has been held that one who acts as bookkeeper in the reconstruction of a building, under a contract with the owner for his services, is not entitled to a lien. Nash v. Southwick, 120 N. C. 459, 27 S. E. 127. To the same effect is Moore v. Industrial Co., 138 N. C. 304, 50 S. E. 687, where it was held that a lien is not given by our Constitution and statute for services rendered, under contract, as superintendent of a milling business, conductor of a commissary or store connected therewith, and as bookkeeper in the same concern. This court, in deciding that case, adopted the definition of the English courts in construing their statute that a laborer or mechanic is "a servant employed in some manual occupation." It is further said that "the word 'labor,' in legal parlance, has a well-defined, understood, and accepted meaning. It implies continued exertion of the more onerous and inferior kind, usually and chiefly consisting in the protracted exertion of muscular force. Labor may be business, but it is not necessarily so, and business is not always labor. "In legal significance, labor implies toil; exertion producing weariness; manual exertion of a toilsome nature"—citing Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387. It was said in Cook v. Tramway Co., 18 Q. B. Div. 684, in construing the English employer's liability act, that, "the expression used [in that act], it should be noted, is not manual work, but manual labor. Many occupations involve the former, but not the latter; for instance, telegraph clerks, bookkeepers, and all persons engaged in writing." Morrison v. Mining Co., 143 N. C. 250, 55 S. E. 611. The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to no lien under his contract to superintend the work, even if he had performed this duty, and certainly he cannot be heard to say that he should have a lien for what he did not do.

[2] Nor is he entitled to a lien for the building plans and specifications, either upon principle or well-considered authority. The language of the statute is that the mechanic or laborer shall have a lien on the property, real or personal for work done on the same. It could hardly be said with correctness and a proper appreciation of the meaning of well-defined terms that an architect, in furnishing plans and specifications for the guidance of the contractor and his mechanics and laborers, is engaged in the act of performing labor upon the building. He ~~uses~~ uses his brain far more than he does his brawn—his trained mental faculties, rather than his physical or muscular powers—and herein, to a large extent, is to be found the distinction between men employed in his kind of work and the laborer, who works mechanically, though under his direction. We are ably and strongly supported in our view of the law by the cases of Mitchell v. Packard, 168 Mass. 467, 47 N. E. 113, 60 Am. St. Rep. 404, and Libbey v. Tidden, 192 Mass. 193, 78 N. E. 313. It has been decided also in other jurisdictions that the word "mechanic," as used in the lien laws, does not include an architect or draughtsman. See cases on this question in 5 Words and Phrases, p. 4457, title "Mechanics," and subtitle, "Architect or draughtsman," a mechanic or laborer (within the meaning of these laws) being a person skilled in the practical use of tools; a workman who shapes and applies material in the building of houses or other structures mentioned in the law; "one actually employed with his own hands in constructive work;" or one so engaged in the application of his own labor to such construction, as contradistinguished from a superintendent or overseer. 5 Words and Phrases, 4457; City of New Orleans v. Lagman, 43 La. Ann. 1180, 10 South. 244; S. &

C. R. Co. v. Callahan, 49 Ga. 506; People v. Board of Aldermen, 18 Misc. Rep. 533, 42 N. Y. Supp. 545; Parkerson v. Wightman, 4 Strob. (S. C.) 363; Raeder v. Bensberg, 6 Mo. App. 445; In re Osborn (D. C.) 104 Fed. 780; Price v. Kirk, 13 Phila. (Pa.) 497. The authorities are not uniform, but those cited are in line with our decisions.

[3] The learned counsel for the plaintiff did not contend that their client had furnished any material to be used in the construction of the house, because he had prepared the plans and specifications, and their position, in this respect, was the correct one. No one would ever think of an architect's building plans and specifications as "material," within the meaning of the statute (Revisal 1905, § 2016), and we do not suppose that architects would classify themselves as "mechanics or laborers." One class is of as high dignity as the other in every way, but they are dissociated in our mental conception of the two; and when we think and speak of them they are naturally differentiated as belonging to separate and distinct callings, or avocations, though held in the same estimation, so far as the worthiness of the pursuit is concerned. We conclude that the architect was not in the mind of the Legislature when it was providing for the lien of mechanics, laborers, and materialmen, not being considered as in the same category, and as requiring the same protection. They can secure themselves in advance against the danger of loss, or at least have a freer hand than the daily laborer, who is often entirely dependent upon his wages for support and maintenance of himself and family, and sometimes at the mercy of an impecunious or dishonest debtor, with whom he is not on equal terms. He occupies more a position of dependence, if not helplessness, than does the architect. Every consideration of fairness and justice favors him, and for this reason were his interests safeguarded by the law, under whose special care and protection he has been taken.

[4-6] Another question remains for decision. If there is no lien, it follows that we have only an unsecured and executory contract of a married woman, which is not enforceable against her, according to our decisions. The cases of Finger v. Hunter, 130 N. C. 529, 41 S. E. 890, and Ball v. Paquin, 140 N. C. 83, 52 S. E. 410, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 307, are not in point. In Finger v. Hunter, we held that the act of 1901, c. 617 (Revisal, § 2016), giving a laborer's lien on the real property of a married woman for work done on her building and for material furnished, was constitutional and valid; and in Ball v. Paquin, we held that the plaintiff acquired a lien for work done and material furnished for the construction of a dwelling on a married woman's land, under a written contract with her and her husband, which was duly proved, as to both, with her privy examination. In both cases there were liens, while in this case there is none, and it is therefore governed by Flaum v. Wallace, 103 N. C. 296, 9 S. E. 567; Weir v. Page, 109 N. C. 220, 13 S. E. 773; Thompson v. Taylor, 110 N. C. 70, 14 S. E. 513; Weathers v. Borders, 124 N. C. 610, 32 S. E. 881; Harvey v. Johnson, 133 N. C. 353, 45 S. E. 644; and the recent case of Kearney v. Vann, 154 N. C. 311, 70 S. E. 747, in which Justice Allen learnedly considers the question. The contract in this case was made before the passage of the act of 1911, c. 109, and is therefore not governed by it. When it was made, the law declared such contracts to be void, which means, of course, that it is the same as if the contract had never been made at all. That which is void, or a nullity, can have had no legal existence or binding obligation, and if the act of 1911 had professed to be retroactive in its operation, and to emancipate married women as to all past, as well as future, contracts, it would have been an unauthorized exercise of legislative power under the Constitution. It may do many things with reference to contracts, but it cannot make a contract between parties, because a contract implies volition and the agreement of two or more minds to one and the same thing; in other words, consent. The Legislature can no more make a contract for parties without their consent, than it can take away a vested right, or impair the obligation of a contract already made. This case is not like Springs v. Scott, 132 N. C. 548, 44 S. E. 116, Anderson v. Wilkins, 142 N. C. 159, 55 S. E. 272, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1145, and other decisions of a like kind, in which the Legislature was dealing with the remedy and with contingent and not vested interests. Parties are entitled to contract according to their free will. They make contracts for themselves, and not by legislative compulsion. The freedom of the right to contract has been universally considered as guaranteed to every citizen. However this may be, we find that the act of 1911 is not retrospective, but prospective, by its very terms, and so the question does not arise as to the power of the Legislature to declare valid a married woman's contract made prior to the act of validation. The language of the act is that a married woman "shall be authorized to contract," which means thereafter; and, further, that the act "shall be in force from and after its ratification," which necessarily, and without express words of retrospection, refers to future transactions. Even in a doubtful case, it should be construed as prospective. We would defeat the legislative intent and make the law, should we decide otherwise. This court said, in State v. Littlefield, 93 N. C. 615: "Such a construction would be giving a retrospective operation to the act, which is in violation of the general rule that 'no statute should have a retrospective effect.' Although the words of the statute are broad enough in their literal extent to comprehend existing cases, they must yet be construed as applicable only to cases that may hereafter arise, unless a contrary intention is unequivocally expressed therein. Potter's Dwaris, p. 162, note 9, and cases cited. There is nothing in the act tending to show an intention in the Legislature to make it retrospective, but, on the other hand, from the use of the term 'original jurisdiction,' it would seem that it was intended that the indictments for such offenses as the inferior court then had jurisdiction of, should thereafter be originated in that court, and that was what was meant by the use of the word 'original' in the statute."

The demurrer was properly sustained.
Affirmed.

ROBERTSON v. HALTON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct 11, 1911.)

1. FRAUD (§ 59*)—DAMAGES.

Where defendant exchanged his mule and $20 for plaintiff's mare, and, upon plaintiff becoming dissatisfied, traded him another mare for the mule, plaintiff was not, in the absence of special damage from the first trade, entitled to recover damages upon each transaction for defendant's misrepresentations, the deceit first practiced upon defendant having been made good by the exchange of the mare for the mule, and plaintiff's ultimate damage was the difference in value between the two mares.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 60-62; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

2. FRAUD (§ 54*)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Where defendant traded his mule and $20 for plaintiff's mare, and, upon plaintiff becoming dissatisfied, traded him another mare for the mule, the deceit in the first transaction, if any, is evidence of the intent or scienter in the last, the two trades being so closely connected; but evidence of the first is relevant only in tending to show deceit in the last.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 50, 51; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

3. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY (§ 13*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for breach of warranty and deceit in an exchange of personal property, there being no special or punitive damages, the damages for the deceit and for the warranty are the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exchange of Property, Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

4. SALES (§ 261*)—WARRANTIES—STATEMENTS CONSTITUTING.

A statement made by a seller which amounts to nothing more than a mere commendation of the goods is not a warranty; but where it takes the form of an opinion, and it is doubtful whether a warranty was intended, the question of warranty is one of fact for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 727-735; Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

5. SALES (§ 445*)—WARRANTIES—QUESTIONS OF LAW.

Where the words or language used by a seller clearly show a warranty, it is the duty of the court to so declare as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1303-1308; Dec. Dig. § 445.*]

6. FRAUD (§ 9*)—DECEIT—ELEMENTS.

The elements of actionable deceit consist of an untrue statement by defendant, made either with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of plaintiff's right, and with intent that plaintiff act upon it, and plaintiff's reliance upon the statement to his damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by John A. Robertson against T. W. Halton. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Moore & Dunn, for appellant. Simmons & Ward, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages in the sum of $125 for deceit and false warranty in a horse trade, and was tried upon issues which, with the answers thereto, are as follows: "(1) Did the defendant procure the exchange of his mule for plaintiff's mare by fraud and misrepresentation as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (2) If so, what damages is plaintiff entitled to recover by reason thereof? Answer: Fifty dollars. (3) Did defendant procure the exchange of his mare for the mule swapped him by plaintiff by fraud and misrepresentation, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (4) If so, what damages is plaintiff entitled to recover by reason thereof? Answer: Seventy-five dollars." Plaintiff alleged that he was fraudulently induced by the defendant to exchange a bay mare he owned and valued at $200 for a mule owned by the defendant, and $20 as the difference in the value between the two animals, with the understanding that the mule could be returned and another mule substituted, if desired by plaintiff; that, in order to induce the plaintiff to trade, the defendant warranted the mule in several respects, and made certain false and deceitful representations to him as to the fine qualities of the mule. When the plaintiff discovered that he had been deceived, he told the defendant that he was not satisfied with the trade, and that he must make his representations good, whereupon the defendant said that he had a good mare he would substitute for the mule, and at the same time made certain warranties and deceitful representations as to her fine qualities. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and the defendant appealed.

[1] It will be observed at a glance by any one reading the evidence sent up that this case has been tried upon a wrong theory.

Why should the defendant be twice mulcted in damages? The trade was, at first, that they should exchange the plaintiff's mare for the mule and $20. If there had been no further exchange or negotiation and there was a breach of warranty, as to the mule, or a deceit practiced upon the plaintiff, he would be entitled to recover this difference between the value of the mule as he was and as he was represented to be, or as, under the contract or the representation, he should have been. When they again traded, the defendant's mare took the place of the mule, and why is not the measure of damages the difference between the value of the defendant's mare, which he substituted for the mule, as it was and as it should have been. The defendant's mare took the place of the mule, and in this way any damages for deceit in the exchange of the mule and $20 "to boot" for the plaintiff's mare were satisfied. If the mare, which was substituted for the mule in the trade, had answered the terms of the warranty or representation, the plaintiff surely could not recover damages for the first deceit, unless he had suffered some special loss in addition to the ordinary damages which result in such cases from the deceit or false warranty, as in Dushane v. Benedict, 120 U. S. 630, 7 Sup. Ct. 696, 38 L. Ed. 810, where the warranty or representation was that certain rags, which the plaintiff sold to the defendant, were clean and in sanitary condition, and they turned out to be infected with germs of smallpox, and consequently the disease broke out in the defendant's mill and spread among his employes, causing him great loss and damage, and the court held that the defendant was entitled to recover damages for the wrong commensurate with loss, either upon the warranty or the count for deceit, and in this connection Justice Gray, who wrote the opinion, said: "The damages recoverable for a breach of warranty, or for a false representation, include all damages which in the contemplation of the parties, or according to the natural or usual course of things, may result from the wrongful act. For instance, if a man sells hay or grain for the purpose of being fed to cattle, or such as is ordinarily used to feed cattle, and it contains a substance which poisons the buyer's cattle, the seller is responsible for the injury. French v. Vinling, 102 Mass. 132, 3 Am. Rep. 440; Wilson v. Dunville, 4 L. R. Ir. 249, and 6 L. R. Ir. 210. So, if one sells an animal, warranting or representing it to be sound, which is in fact infected with disease, he is responsible for the damages resulting from a communication of the disease to the buyer's other animals, either in an action for tort for the false representation (Mullett v. Mason, L. R. 1 C. P. 559; Jeffrey v. Bigelow, 13 Wend.

(N. Y.) 518, 28 Am. Dec. 476; Faris v. Lewis, 2 B. Mon. (Ky.) 375; Sherrod v. Langdon, 21 Iowa, 518; Marsh v. Webber, 16 Minn. 418 [Gil. 375]), or in an action on the warranty, either in tort (Packard v. Slack, 32 Vt. 9; Smith v. Green, 1 C. P. D. 92), or even in contract (Black v. Elliott, 1 Fost. & Fin. 595. See, also, Randall v. Newson, 2 Q. B. D. 102). There is no evidence now in this case of any damage of that kind and the ordinary rule prevails which may be thus expressed: The difference in actual value between the article as warranted and the article as delivered is all that can be properly recovered as damages, unless in exceptional cases of special damages. Whatever that difference in the actual circumstances of the case is shown to be is the true rule and measure of damages, where the articles delivered are not what the contract calls for. Marsh v. McPherson, 105 U. S. 709, 26 L. Ed. 1139.

[2] While the court seems to have given the correct instruction in regard to the measure of damages—that is, the difference between the value of the mare, as represented by the defendant, and its real value—the jury were permitted, under the direction of the court, to assess damages as to both transactions, the first swap and the second or substituted one. This was error. The charge of the court is also very meager, and as to the deceit it omitted an essential element—the scienter. There was abundant proof of a scienter, but it was not correctly applied, if considered at all in the charge, and for that reason we have called attention to the law, as stated in former decisions of this court, and it will be well in such cases to be guided by them. The deceit in the first transaction, if established, will be evidence of the intent or scienter in the last, as the two are so closely connected with each other, and such evidence is admissible to show fraud in the second exchange, under the rule in Brink v. Black, 77 N. C. 59, and subsequent cases approving it. Gilmer v. Hanks, 84 N. C. 317; Coble v. Huffines, 133 N. C. 422, 45 S. E. 760. A case directly in point is State v. Weaver, 104 N. C. 758, 10 S. E. 486. But the first transaction is not a separate cause of action, and is only relevant to the controversy as tending to show the deceitful purpose in the last exchange.

[3] We decide, therefore, that there should have been two separate issues, one as to the warranty, and the other as to damages, unless the case is so presented at the next trial that the rule of damages for the deceit and the one for the warranty will not be the same, in which case there may be an issue as to the damages for each cause of action, but we hardly see how this can be upon the evidence as it now appears. When there are no punitive damages, one issue as to damages, in cases like this, is generally sufficient, unless there is more than one cause of action, so relating to different transactions as to entitle the plaintiff or other party to an assessment of damages upon each of them.

[4-6] In regard to the nature of the warranty or deceit, much must depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case, as it is presented. We have stated some general rules, though, which will serve as guides to us in such matters: (1) When the statements made by sellers amount to nothing more upon their face than a mere commendation of the goods which is usual in sales, a puffing of wares, as it is sometimes called, there is no warranty or deceit. Cash Register Co. v. Townsend, 137 N. C. 852, 50 S. E. 306, 70 L. R. A. 349. (2) Where the statement takes the form of an opinion or estimate of value or quality, and it is doubtful whether or not a warranty was intended, the question should be submitted to the jury to say whether one was, in fact, intended. Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft, 155 N. C. 63, 71 S. E. 61, citing authorities. In McKinnon v. McIntosh, 98 N. C. 89, 3 S. E. 840, it was said upon a kindred question, relating to a sale of fertilizers: "The defendant had a right to have the question whether the force and effect of the affirmations of the plaintiff in regard to the quality of the fertilizer did not constitute a warranty of the quality, go to the jury. If the vendor represents an article as possessing a value which upon proof it does not possess, he is liable on a warranty express or implied, although he may not have known such an affirmation to be false, if such representation was intended, not as a mere expression of opinion, but the positive assertion of a fact upon which the purchaser acts; and this is a question for the jury. Thompson v. Tate, 5 N. C. 97 [3 Am. Dec. 678]; Inge v. Bond, 10 N. C. 101; Foggart v. Blackwelder, 28 N. C. 238; Bell v. Jeffreys, 35 N. C. 356; Henson v. King, 48 N. C. 419; Lewis v. Rountree, 78 N. C. 323; Baum v. Stevens, 24 N. C. 411." (3) Where, though, the words or language clearly show a warranty, it becomes a question of law for the court, without the aid of the jury, to so declare, as in Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft, supra; Machine Co. v. Feezer, 152 N. C. 516, 67 S. E. 1004; Audit Co. v. Taylor, 152 N. C. 272, 67 S. E. 582. (4) In order to constitute a deceit, several facts must concur and be established by the proof. There must be a statement made by the defendant (a) which is untrue. (b) The person making the statement, or the person responsible for it, either must know it to be untrue or be culpably ignorant (that is, recklessly and consciously ignorant) whether it be true or not. (c) It must be made with the intent that the plaintiff shall act upon it or in a manner apparently fitted to induce him to act upon it. (d) The plaintiff must act in reliance on the statement in the manner contemplated or manifestly probable, and thereby suffer damage. 71 S. E. 62, second column; Pollock on Torts (7th Ed.) 276; Whitehurst v. Insurance Co., 149 N. C. 273, 62 S. E. 1067; Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft, supra. The gist of the action for deceit is fraudulently producing a false impression upon the mind of the other party by words or acts, or concealment or suppression of material facts not equally within the knowledge or reach of the plaintiff. Stewart v. Wyoming Cattle Ranch Co., 128 U. S. 383, 9 Sup. Ct. 101, 32 L. Ed. 439. In order to maintain the action, it is sufficient to show that the defendant practiced a deception with the design of depriving the plaintiff of some right, profit, or advantage, and to acquire it for himself or avail himself of it in some way. National Bank v. Petrie, 189 U. S. 423-425, 23 Sup. Ct. 512, 47 L. Ed. 879. In Whitmire v. Heath (at last term) 155 N. C. 304, 71 S. E. 314, the three requisites of an actionable deceit were thus stated: "(1) The representation must be false. (2) The party making it must know that it is false, commonly called the 'scienter.' (3) It must have misled the other party and induced him to contract upon the faith of the representation as true" — citing numerous cases and specially Lunn v. Shermer, 93 N. C. 164; Black v. Black, 110 N. C. 308, 14 S. E. 971; Ashe v. Gray, 88 N. C. 190 (s. c. on rehearing, 90 N. C. 137)—all actions against horse dealers. (5) A warranty is contractual, but may be joined with a cause of action for deceit which is a tort. The old and new mode of pleading is clearly stated in Ashe v. Gray, supra, and, quoting from the opinion of the court (by Chief Justice Pearson) in Bullinger v. Marshall, 70 N. C. 520, Chief Justice Smith says: "If there be a warranty of soundness in the sale of a horse, the vendee may sue upon the contract of warranty, and the justice of the peace has jurisdiction, or may declare in tort for a false warranty and add a count in deceit, in which case a justice of the peace has not jurisdiction, the plaintiff being permitted to declare collaterally in tort for a false warranty in order to enable him to give in a count for the deceit, which, of course, was in tort." Ashe v. Gray, 88 N. C. 192. See, also, same case (Ashe v. Gray) on rehearing, 90 N. C. 137.

For the error noted by us, a new trial upon all the issues will be had in the lower court.

BLOW v. JOYNER.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 111*)—DEFAULT—EFFECT.

A judgment by default and inquiry, in an action for unliquidated damages, establishes plaintiff's right of action, entitling him to nominal damages; and evidence is not admissible on the inquiry as to damages to bar plaintiff's right of action, though it may be admissible to fix the amount of the damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 202; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

2. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 39*)—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Punitive damages may be recovered, in an action for forcible trespass accompanied by assault upon the person, if the injury is willful and malicious, or wanton.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 208*)—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—JURY QUESTION.

Where the action is such that punitive damages may be awarded, the question of whether they shall be allowed should be left to the jury, under instructions as to the law applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 111*)—DEFAULT—EFFECT.

A judgment by default and inquiry, in an action for unliquidated damages, only entitles plaintiff to nominal damages as a matter of law.

5. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—"ACTUAL DAMAGES."

Where plaintiff was only entitled to nominal damages as a matter of law, in a forcible trespass action, the judgment being by default and inquiry, and the evidence of actual damage being conflicting, it was error to charge that plaintiff was entitled to some "actual" damages in any view of the case; the term "actual damages," as used, meaning "substantial," as distinguished from "nominal," damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Carter, Judge.

Action by S. C. Blow against E. H. Joyner. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Civil action to recover damages for alleged forcible trespass, accompanied by assault on the person. Judgment by default and inquiry was entered. The cause having been placed on the calendar for the purpose, the same came on for hearing on the issue as to damages. Verdict was rendered and damages assessed in plaintiff's favor for $300.

D. C. Barnes, for appellant. Winborne & Winborne, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The gravamen of plaintiff's cause of action is stated in the complaint as follows: "That, while plaintiff and his family were in such occupancy of said buildings and premises, the defendant, on Friday, the 27th day of August, 1909, unlawfully and wrongfully and with a strong hand entered and forcibly trespassed on said premises, and in the lot and yard on said premises, where the plaintiff and his family were living, armed with a pistol, and in the presence of the plaintiff and his wife, and threatened, cursed, abused, and assaulted plaintiff, and refused to leave said premises and said yard, after he was commanded by plaintiff and his wife to leave said yard and said premises, and remained thereon, using profane and vulgar language, to the great annoyance of plaintiff and his wife and to the great damage of plaintiff." And there was evidence on part of plaintiff tending to support the allegations as made, except there seems to be no reference to a pistol in the statement of the witnesses, a difference in no way affecting the questions presented.

[1] It was objected to the validity of the trial that his honor charged the jury that the "judgment by default and inquiry established the fact that the defendant was a trespasser, and by reason of that fact defendant was estopped from denying that he was a trespasser upon the possessions of the plaintiff," but the objection, in our opinion, is not well taken. The authorities are very generally to the effect that, where a complaint has been properly filed, showing a right of action for unliquidated damages, a judgment by default and inquiry establishes plaintiff's right of action and that he is entitled at least to nominal damages. Osborne v. Leach, 133 N. C. 428, 45 S. E. 783; 2 Black on Judgments, § 698; 23 Cyc. p. 752; 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 127. And in this state it is further held that such a judgment concludes on all issuable facts properly pleaded, and that evidence in bar of plaintiff's right of action is not admissible on the inquiry as to damages. McLeod v. Nimocks, 122 N. C. 438, 29 S. E. 577; Lee v. Knapp, 90 N. C. 171; Parker & Gatling v. House, 66 N. C. 374; Parker & Gatling v. Smith, 64 N. C. 291; Garrard v. Dollar, 49 N. C. 175, 67 Am. Dec. 271. In McLeod v. Nimocks it is said: "The judgment by default and inquiry, the defendant having said nothing in answer to plaintiff's complaint, was conclusive that the plaintiff had a cause of action against the defendant of the nature declared in the complaint, and would be entitled to nominal damages without any proof." The statement sometimes made, that a judgment of this kind "merely admits a cause of action, while the precise character of the cause of action and the extent of defendant's liability remains to be determined," simply means, as stated, that a judgment by default and inquiry established a right of action in plaintiff of the kind stated in the complaint, and entitling plaintiff to nominal damages, but that the facts and attendant circumstances giving character to the transactions and relevant as tending to fix the quantum of damages must be shown, and in this sense only is the statement in question approved in Osborne v. Leach, supra. His honor, therefore, properly held that the judgment by default operated as an estoppel to the extent stated.

[2, 3] Defendant excepted further that, under the charge and on the evidence, the jury were allowed to consider the question of punitive damages and award the same in their discretion; the objection being, first, that no such damages are permissible in this character of action; second, that, if otherwise, the allowance of such damages on a given state of facts was a question of law for the court, and should not be submitted to the discretion of the jury, but authority with us is against defendant on both positions. In Ammons v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 200, 52 S. E. 731, on this question of punitive damages, it was said: "Exemplary or punitive damages are not given with a view to compensation, but are under certain circumstances awarded in addition to compensation, as a punishment to defendant, and as a warning to other wrongdoers. They are not allowed as a matter of course, but only when there are some features of aggravation, as when the wrong is done willfully and maliciously, or under circumstances of rudeness or oppression, or in a manner which evinces a reckless and wanton disregard of plaintiff's rights." In Brame v. Clark, 148 N. C. 364, 62 S. E. 418, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1033, and Duncan v. Stalcup, 18 N. C. 440, it has been expressly held that if a trespass has been committed under the circumstances stated punitive damages may be allowed. And in Billings v. Observer Co., 150 N. C. 540, 64 S. E. 435, it was held that, "where on the facts a question of punitive damages is presented, the award of such damages and the amount thereof, under a proper charge, is for the jury." In such case the court will state the law applicable, and the jury in their discretion will determine whether punitive damages shall be allowed, and, if so, fix the amount of same.

[4] While we uphold the rulings of his honor in reference to exceptions thus far noted, we are of opinion that defendant is entitled to a new trial by reason of his charge, duly excepted to; that plaintiff is entitled to some actual damages in any view of the case. Recurring to the authorities heretofore cited, it will appear that a judgment by default and inquiry only concludes as to the existence of plaintiff's cause of action and his right to recover nominal damages. Any damages beyond that sum is left an open question, to be determined from the facts and attendant circumstances of the occurrence. While the evidence of plaintiff tended to show an injury under circumstances of insult, rudeness, and oppression, there was testimony on the part of defendant in full denial of plaintiff's position, and tending to show that as a matter of fact plaintiff himself was in great measure to blame.

[5] In this conflict of evidence, it was not within the province of the court to tell the jury that they should, in any event, allow the plaintiff some actual damages, which by correct interpretation must be taken to mean substantial, as distinguished from nominal, damages. Ammons v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 190, 52 S. E. 731; Chaffin v. Manufacturing Co., 135 N. C. 102, 47 S. E. 226; Sutherland on Damages, 9; Black's Law Dictionary, 29. The expression found in some of the opinions that on judgment by default the plaintiff is entitled to some damages, as in Dougherty v. Stepp, 18 N. C. 371, and Parker v. House, was used in reference to a claim set up that no right of action had been established, because no tortious entry had been shown and no actual damages proven, and was not made in reference to the quantum of damages, nor intended to displace or impair the position that a judgment by default and inquiry only concludes as to plaintiff's cause of action and the right to recover nominal damages.

For the error indicated, there must be a new trial, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

STATE v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct 11, 1911.)

1. ANIMALS (§ 82*)—INJURIES BY ANIMALS—RIGHT TO ACTION—SCIENTER.

To recover damages for injuries to property committed by a dog, plaintiff must show knowledge by the owner of his malicious propensities.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Cent. Dig. §§ 288-292; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

2. ANIMALS (§ 45*)—KILLING ANIMALS—CIVIL RESPONSIBILITY.

A dog may be killed in the actual and necessary defense of property attacked by it though the owner did not know of its vicious propensities, and there may have been another mode of defending the property attacked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

3. ANIMALS (§ 45*)—KILLING DOGS—CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY—DEFINITIONS—REPUTATION OF DOG—"ANIMAL"—"CRUELLY."

A dog is the subject of property, both in the absence of statute and under Revisal 1905, § 3290, making it a misdemeanor to willfully injure or cruelly kill any useful animal, and defining the word "animal" as including every living creature, and the word "cruelly" to include every act causing unjustifiable physical pain or death, so that accused was guilty of the offense of willfully killing a dog, where the dog, when killed, was in the street outside of his turkey yard, which was inclosed by an impassable fence and gate, and could have been driven away; the fact that the dog had been in the yard before, harrassing the turkeys, and his bad habits, being immaterial.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Error in an instruction, in a prosecution for willfully killing a dog, that the fact that the dog, when killed, was actually killing accused's turkeys was not justification was harmless, where there was no evidence that the turkeys were in imminent danger from the dog, when he was killed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Peebles, Judge.

Ashton Smith and another were convicted of willfully killing a dog, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Rouse & Land, for appellants. Attorney General Bickett and G. L. Jones, for the State.

WALKER, J. The defendants were indicted in the court below for the crime of willfully killing a dog, the property of the prosecutor. It would be vain and unprofitable to discuss, for the purpose of deciding, that a dog is a living creature, within the meaning of Revisal 1905, § 3290, under which the indictment was drawn and presented by the grand jury. We have held that he is a subject of property, a domesticated animal, and not merely feræ naturæ, and that a civil action may be maintained for damages caused by an injury to him, though he may have been guilty of some "youthful indiscretion" or harmless transgression. A dog is like a man in one respect at least—that is, he will do wrong sometimes; but, if the wrong is slight or trivial, he does not thereby forfeit his life. The opinion of Judge Gaston, in Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. (Ann. Ed.) 282, 32 Am. Dec. 677, has been generally taken as a clear and accurate statement of the law in regard to the right of property in this much petted and sometimes useful animal. That was a civil action to recover damages for killing the plaintiff's dog; the defendant contending that a dog was not property, and therefore no action would lie for any injury to him. In view of this contention, Judge Gaston said: "It was not necessary for the maintenance of the action that the plaintiff's dog should be shown to have pecuniary value. Dogs belong to that class of domiciled animals which the law recognizes as objects of property, and whatever it recognizes as property it will protect from invasion by a civil action on the part of the owners. It is not denied that a dog may be of such ferocious disposition or predatory habits as to render him a nuisance to the community, and such a dog, if permitted to go at large, may be destroyed by any person. But it would be monstrous to require exemption from all fault as a condition of existence. That the plaintiff's dog on one occasion stole an egg, and afterwards snapped at the heel of the man who had hotly pursued him flagrante delicto, that on another occasion he barked at the doctor's horse, and that he was shrewdly suspected in early life to have worried a sheep, make up a catalogue of offenses not very numerous, nor of a very heinous character. If such defections as these from strict propriety be sufficient to give a dog a bad name and kill him, the entire race of these faithful and useful animals might be rightly extirpated." It was next held in State v. Latham, 35 N. C. 33, that the owner has such property in a dog that an indictment for malicious mischief in killing him will lie. These cases were followed by others, deciding different questions, but all recognizing the general rule that a dog is property. Perry v. Phipps, 32 N. C. 259, 51 Am. Dec. 387; Mowery v. Salisbury, 82 N. C. 177 (right to tax them). In State v. Latham, supra, the indictment was for malicious mischief, and the judge, by his charge, let the guilt of the defendant turn altogether upon an affirmative answer to the question whether the defendant, in killing the dog, was acting in defense of his property, without regard to whether or not he did so from malice to the owner. This was held to be error, as the gist of the offense was malice to the owner, and the killing, from passion excited against the dog by the injury or threatened injury to property, was not any defense, provided the defendant was actuated by malice towards the owner. In that case, Judge Nash took occasion to say: "By the old authorities, a dog was not a subject of larceny, because it was without value. But, notwithstanding, it is a species of property, recognized as such by the law, and for an injury to which an action at law will be sustained. Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. 282, 32 Am. Dec. 677. Many actions have been brought in this state, and in England, for injuries to such property. 2 Bl. Com. 393, 394. If, then, dogs be personal property, they are protected by the law, and the owner has such an interest in them as that he can protect and defend them; and the destruction of them, from malice to the owner, is, in law, malicious mischief."

Although counsel did not so contend, we must say that the dog is not an animal of such base nature or low degree, whatever his pedigree may be, as not to be entitled to the consideration and full protection of the law, or as to subject him to outlawry, if he has a bad reputation, or at least a habit of killing fowls, so that if he lurks near where they are to be found, although they are protected by a sufficient fence or other barrier against his predatory and ferocious disposition, he may be killed, even if he is not engaged in the actual attempt to slay and devour his supposed prey, or the danger of his doing so is not so imminent or immediately threatening that a prudent and reasonable man would be led to believe that his property is in jeopardy. We cannot give our assent to this principle. Admit such a right, and the peace and good order of society would be seriously endangered and could not well be preserved, for the exercise of such a right would excite the most angry passions and resentment of the dog's owner and eventually result in personal violence, thus disrupting the peace and quiet of the community. So thought Judge Pearson, in Morse v. Nixon, 51 N. C. 293. But we think that the dog is not an animal of such low origin and of such a base nature as to be beyond the pale of the law. The right to slay him cannot be justified merely by the baseness of his nature, but it is founded upon the natural right to protect person or property. He has the good will of mankind because of his friendship and loyalty, which are such marked traits of his character that they have been touchingly portrayed, both in song and story. Why, then, should he be declared an outlaw and a nuisance, and forfeit his life without any sufficient cause? This was never the law. Neither at the common law, nor since the passage of our present statute, prohibiting cruelty to animals, can a dog be killed for the commission of any slight or trivial offense (State v. Neal, 120 N. C. 614, 27 S. E. 81, 68 Am. St. Rep. 810); nor to redress past grievances (Morse v. Nixon, supra). As said by Chief Justice Pearson in the last-cited case: "It may be the killing will be justified by proving that the danger was imminent, making it necessary 'then and there' to kill the hog in order to save the life of the chicken, or prevent great bodily harm."

[1] It was well said by the Chief Justice in that case that, in order to recover damages in a civil action for injuries to property committed by a hog (or dog), the plaintiff must prove, as we say, a scienter; that is, knowledge of his vicious propensities, as in the case of the deer in the Saratoga Park (Spring Co. v. Edgar, 99 U. S. 645, 25 L. Ed. 487), where it was held: "Certain animals feræ naturæ may doubtless be domesticated to such an extent as to be classed, in respect to the liability of the owner for injuries they commit, with the class known as tame or domestic animals; but, inasmuch as they are liable to relapse into their wild habits and to become mischievous, the rule is that if they do so, and the owner becomes notified of their vicious habit, they are included in the same rule as if they had never been domesticated; the gist of the action in such a case, as in the case of untamed wild animals, being not merely the negligent keeping of the animal, but the keeping of the same with knowledge of the vicious and mischievous propensity of the animal. Wharton, Negligence, § 922; Decker v. Gammon, 44 Me. 322 [69 Am. Dec. 99]. Three or more classes of cases exist, in which it is held that the owners of animals are liable for injuries done by the same to the persons or property of others; the required allegations and proofs varying in each case. 2 Bl. Com. per Cooley, 390. Owners of wild beasts, or beasts that are in their nature vicious, are liable under all or most all circumstances for injuries done by them; and in actions for injuries by such beasts it is not necessary to allege that the owner knew them to be mischievous, for he is presumed to have such knowledge, from which it follows that he is guilty of negligence in permitting the same to be at large. Though the owner have no particular notice that the animal ever did any such mischief before, yet, if the animal be of the class that is feræ naturæ, the owner is liable to an action of damage, if it get loose and do harm. 1 Hale, P. C. 430; Worth v. Gillling, Law Rep. 2 C. P. 3. Owners are liable for the hurt done by the animal, even without notice of the propensity, if the animal is naturally mischievous; but if it is of a tame nature there must be notice of the vicious habit. Mason v. Keeling, 12 Mod. Rep. 332; Rex v. Huggins, 2 Ld. Raym. 1574. Damage may be done by a domestic animal kept for use or convenience, but the rule is that the owner is not liable to an action on the ground of negligence, without proof that he knew that the animal was accustomed to do mischief. Vrooman v. Lawyer, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 339; Buxendin v. Sharp, 2 Salk. 662; Cockerham v. Nixon [33 N. C.] 269. Domestic animals, such as oxen or horses, may injure the person or property of another, but courts of justice invariably hold that if they are rightfully in the place where the injury is inflicted the owner of the animal is not liable for such an injury, unless he knew that the animal was accustomed to be vicious; and in suits for such injuries such knowledge must be alleged and proved, as the cause of action arises from the keeping of the animal after the knowledge of its vicious propensity. Jackson v. Smithson, 15 Mée. & W. 563; Van Leuven v. Lyke, 1 N. Y. 515 [49 Am. Dec. 346]; Card v. Case, 5 C. B. 632; Hudson v. Roberts, 6 Exch. 697; Dearth v. Baker, 22 Wis. 73; Cox v. Burbridge, 13 C. B. (N. S.) 430." It would therefore, be strange if a person is privileged to take the law into his own hands, and redress supposed and past grievances by an extra-judicial method or remedy, under circumstances which may not entitle him to sue for and recover damages in a civil action. Such a view of the law was adopted in Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. 282, 32 Am. Dec. 677, but it has been said of that case by the court, in Morse v. Nixon, supra (opinion by Chief Justice Pearson), that Judge Gaston fell into error in his dictum that a dog may, by reason of his predatory habits, become a public nuisance, so that any person may kill him in order to abate the nuisance, although not specially injured or aggrieved. We think the law of this state is correctly stated by Judge Gaston (as far as he went) in Parrott v. Hartsfield, 20 N. C. (Ann. Ed.) 242, 32 Am. Dec. 673, as follows: "The law authorizes the act of killing a dog found on a man's premises in the act of attempting to destroy his sheep, calves, conies in a warren, deer in a park, or other reclaimed animals used for human food, and unable to defend themselves. Wadhurst v. Damme, Cro. Jm. 45; Barrington v. Summers, 3 Lev. 28; Leonard v. Wilkins, 9 Johns. [N. Y.] 233."

[2] In the actual and necessary defense of property, it is not necessary to show that the owner of the dog knew of his vicious propensities, or that there was no other mode of defending the things assailed. Com. Dig. Pleader, 3 M. 331, § 336. "The law is different where the dog is chasing animals feræ naturæ, such as hares or deer in a wild state, or combating with another dog. In these cases a necessity for the act of killing must be made out, or the killing will not be justified. Wright v. Ramscot, 1 Saun. 82; Vere v. Ld. Cawdor, 11 East. 567. The object of the law in conferring this authority is not to punish past wrongs, but to prevent wrongs impending or menaced. It may therefore be exercised before the injury is begun, if, in truth, it be imminent, for otherwise the preventive remedy may be too late." Parrott v. Hartsfield, supra. This court (by Chief Justice Pearson), in Morse v. Nixon, approved the rule as thus stated by Judge Gaston. It is true that Judge Pearson added this qualification, or expressed this doubt: "But we are inclined to the opinion that, even under these circumstances, it is not justifiable to kill the hog. It should be impounded or driven away, and notice given to the owner, so that he may put it up; at all events, this course is dictated by the moral duty of good neighborhood." But we conclude that the better doctrine is the first one stated by the learned Chief Justice, and the one fully sustained by the opinion of the court in Parrott v. Hartsfield, supra. If the danger to the animal, whose injury or destruction is threatened, be imminent, or his safety presently menaced, in the sense that a man of ordinary prudence would be reasonably led to believe that it is necessary for him to kill, in order to protect his property, and to act at once, he may defend it, even unto the death of the dog, or other animal, which is about to attack it. We understand this to be the law as declared in a very brief opinion of the court (by Rodman, J.), in Williams v. Dixon, 65 N. C. 416, citing and approving what is said to that effect in Parrott v. Hartsfield and Morse v. Nixon. It is taken for granted, in Runyan v. Patterson, 87 N. C. 343, that if a hog or dog is caught in flagrante delicto, or "red-handed"—that is, while in the act of injuring property, such as turkeys or chickens—he may be shot on the spot by their owner, citing the above cases. Why not, if he is about to spring upon his prey, and when the necessity of protecting his property reasonably appears to its owner to be just as imperative? Our statute (Revisal, § 3299) makes it criminal to willfully or cruelly kill or injure any useful animal, employing that word in the sense of any "living creature," and "cruelty" is defined in the same section to mean "any act, omission or neglect, whereby unjustifiable physical pain, suffering or death is caused or permitted." So far as this case is concerned, and the point raised by the defendant, we do not think the statute has materially changed the law as formerly declared. The defendant is guilty at common law, and surely under the statute, if he unjustifiably killed the dog, and what is an unwarranted or unjustifiable killing has already been fully stated.

[3, 4] Upon the facts of this case, we are of the opinion, and so decide, that the defendants were guilty, and that, while the judge erred when he charged that, if the dog was actually killing the turkeys, it would be no defense or justification for the killing, this error was harmless, as there was no evidence that the danger to the turkeys was imminent, and the necessity to kill was apparent. The fact that the dog had visited the premises before, if it had been proven, would not justify the defendant's act in slaying him. It is not the dog's predatory habits, nor his past transgressions, nor his reputation, however bad, but the doctrine of self-defense whether of person or property, that gives the right to kill. The dog was not in a position, with reference to the turkeys, to make the danger to them imminent; he being in the road or street outside the defendant's yard, with an impassable fence and closed gate between him and them. He could easily have been driven away without resorting to extreme punishment, for it was nothing but punishment inflicted upon him for his supposed past transgressions; that is, resentment and retaliation. It was an act unlawful at common law, and willful, within the meaning of the statute, even as construed in State v. Clifton, 152 N. C. 802, 67 S. E. 751, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 673.

No error.

Action by Charles C. Burlingham and others against H. C. Canady and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. C. Wooten, for appellants. E. K. Bryan and Frank Thompson, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The defendants in this case appealed to this court from a verdict and judgment rendered against them in the court below, and served their case on appeal upon the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, disagreeing to this case, prepared a counter case and caused the same to be duly served upon the defendant's counsel by the sheriff, who made a return to that effect. Both cases were then filed in the clerk's office. Plaintiff's counsel moved in this court to affirm the judgment, as no case on appeal had been sent to this court, though the record proper is here, the motion being based upon the ground that counsel disagreed to the case, and the judge was not requested, as required by Revisal 1905, § 591, to settle the case, and that no case on appeal has actually been settled. Plaintiff's counsel filed an affidavit, in which he denied positively that any counter case or exceptions had been served upon him or the defendants, and that he inquired of the clerk, who told him that no such case or exceptions had been filed in his office. This is the only affidavit introduced in behalf of the defendants. Plaintiffs filed the affidavits of Mr. Frank Thompson, one of their attorneys, and the sheriff, E. W. Summerville, who state that the counter case was served upon the defendants' counsel on June 14, 1911, and the sheriff's return also shows that such service was made by him. M. M. Capps, the clerk, testifies that the counter case was filed in his office, and he thought that it was sent up with the record to this court, and that the statement to the contrary in his certificate is an error which he inadvertently committed, as the record for this court was prepared by the defendant's attorneys at their request, and was presented to him for his signature to the certificate, and he supposed, of course, that the record was in proper form and contained the counter case on appeal, and he so stated to Mr. Frank Thompson, defendant's attorney, afterwards. The record here does not contain the counter case, but only the case as tendered by the defendants to the plaintiffs. Under the circumstances, we must grant the plaintiff's motion and affirm, as we discover no error in the record proper.

[1] The sheriff's return imports truth. It is made under oath and cannot be overthrown or shown to be false by the affidavit merely of the person upon whom the service is alleged to have been made. It has often been held that the return of a ministerial officer as to what he has done out of court is prima facie true, and cannot be contradicted by a single affidavit. Hunter v. Kirk, 11 N. C. 277; Mason v. Miles, 63 N. C. 564. It would be oath against oath, and we could not well say with whom was the truth. Besides, the service of process or other papers, and the return thereof, are very serious matters, and should not be lightly set aside. In this case, though, the sheriff's return is strongly corroborated by the affidavits of Mr. Thompson, the clerk, and the officer himself, and, if no technical force or weight is to be given to the return, we would be bound by the decided weight of the evidence to find against the defendants as to the fact of service.

[2] As the countercase was properly served, it was the duty of the defendants to immediately request the judge to appoint a time and place to settle the case under Revisal, § 591, and, upon his failure to comply with this requirement of the statute, the case of the appellee became the case on appeal. As that case has not been certified to this Court as part of the transcript, and therefore has not been printed, we affirm the judgment.

Affirmed.

Where a railroad engineer, by keeping a lookout, could have seen, by ordinary care, that a collision with a horse and cart was imminent in time to stop his train and avoid it, it was his duty to do so, and, notwithstanding a failure to look and listen at the crossing, the plaintiff could recover for injuries caused by the collision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by Harvey C. Hines against the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. New trial.

This action is to recover damages for injury to the horse and wagon of the plaintiff. The plaintiff alleges that the injury occurred on the 16th day of December, 1909, and was caused by the negligence of the defendant, which is denied. The wagon was loaded with apples, and the injury occurred about 8 o'clock a. m., at the first crossing after leaving the depot at Kinston. There is evidence that the driver did not look and listen before entering upon the track, and that he saw the train of the defendant as he reached the track. It is admitted that the horse and wagon crossed the track of the defendant in safety, and had reached a point 25 or 28 yards beyond the track, at the time the train of the defendant, about 75 yards distant, was approaching the crossing. The horse then began backing, and according to the evidence of the plaintiff did not stop until the wagon collided with the engine. There is some evidence of obstructions to the view near the track; but there is also evidence that the horse was in full view of the engine, and the engineer admitted that he saw the horse backing when he was within 40 or 50 feet of the crossing. There is also evidence that the train was running about 4 or 5 miles an hour, and could have been stopped in eight feet, and that the engineer called to the driver of the wagon, and told him to stop backing his horse into the train.

The driver gives the following account of the occurrence: "Q. What took place when you came to the track? A. I done crossed the track; the train bell was ringing, and my horse looked up like he saw it, and stopped; and he commenced to back back. When he commenced to back back, I commenced tapping him, to keep him from backing. I saw he was going to stop, and I jumped off and ran to his head, so as to pull him around the corner. He kept backing. I ran to the end of the dray. When I got to the back, the train was very near. I slid out from behind the cart, and the train struck the back end of the dray, and knocked the horse down. The front part of the bumper struck the cart; the back end of the dray was struck by the cowcatcher. [It is admitted that the street crossing Gordon is Independence street.] Q. When you crossed the track going this way, did you see the train? A. Yes, sir; it was further down, about 75 steps, yards—something like that—from the street I was crossing. Q. When your horse stopped and was looking at the train, can you estimate how fast the train was going? A. About 4 or 5 miles an hour. Q. When the train was coming towards you, did you see anybody looking out of the windows of the train? A. There was a whole lot looking out. The engineer called to me, and said to stop backing my horse in the train. Q. Where was he? How far was the engineer when he was talking to you about not backing your horse? A. About 15 or 20 steps from me. Q. How long have you been driving a horse? A. I have been tending to him for about a year. I have been accustomed to horses for about 15 or 20 years. Q. What damage was done to the wagon after the mix-up? A. The right wheel was torn to pieces—the right wheel and shafts. Q. What injury did the horse receive? A. The right foot—I think it was the right one—broke in two. They had to kill him. He was smashed up. Q. What else was done besides breaking his leg? A. Just smashed him right down."

The defendant offered evidence to the contrary, and the engineer testified as follows: "Q. Were you the engineer on the train at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long have you been in the service of the company? A. On this road 11 years. Q. State what you saw. A. I noticed when I approached this crossing—I was about as far from here to the door, the length of this building—this driver was sitting up in front of his cart when I noticed him. By my noticing him, the horse was backing; the driver jumped off. The horse was backing; that put him in this direction [indicating]. The lines were over the hames; the horse kept rearing. I began to slow up; the horse backed up more, less than the width of this stand, and stopped. I ran the engine, and when I was going by the horse reared up. That brought him by the engine, and the crank pin on the driver struck the cart, and threw the horse under the tender, and broke his leg and bruised him up. Q. You say you were the length of this building when you first saw him? A. I might have been more. Q. How close were you when you first saw him? A. If he had kept on, he would have gone by; the horse stopped about 10 feet of the engine. I released her, and let her go by. Q. How far did you run after you struck the cart? A. I judge about eight feet; it didn't make a revolution. The crank pin came just near enough to slew the horse around; it struck the right wheel of the cart. The driver was on the opposite side of me. Q. William Hadley said you hollered to him? A. No, sir; I never said a word to him until I stopped. The horse was down. I said, 'Why did you want to back the horse in the train?' Q. When the horse began to back the last time, could you have stopped the train to prevent him from backing the cart into the train? A. No sir; it was so quick. He stood so a little time. I guess I moved the length of this room before he moved the second time—enough for me to go by him. Instead of the horse going forward, the driver had the reins on him; he backed back. Q. What part of the engine struck the horse? A. The front driver struck the cart; that is, middle of the engine."

Upon the conclusion of the evidence, his honor granted the motion of the defendant for judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Loftin & Dawson, for appellant. Rouse & Land, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The right of the plaintiff to maintain this action must be determined by the conduct of the parties after the time the horse began to back, and, if the evidence presents a phase from which the jury could find that the engineer, by keeping a lookout, could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have seen that a collision was imminent, in time to stop his train and avoid it, then it was his duty to do so, and if the jury should so find the plaintiff could recover, notwithstanding the failure of the driver to look and listen at the crossing. This is clearly stated by Justice Hoke, in Snipes v. Manf. Co., 152 N. C. 46, 67 S. E. 29. After discussing the duty of the engineer to keep a lookout, and to stop and avoid injury when he can do so by the exercise of ordinary care, he says: "Ordinarily, cases calling for application of the doctrine indicated arise when the injured person was down on the track, apparently unconscious or helpless; but such extreme conditions are not at all essential, and the ruling should prevail whenever an engineer operating a railroad train does, or, in proper performance of his duty, should, observe that a collision is not improbable, and that a person is in such a position of peril that ordinary effort on his part will not likely avail to save him from injury; and the authorities are also to the effect that an engineer in such circumstances should resolve doubts in favor of the safer course." The quotation speaks in terms of persons, but the principle also applies to injury to property.

[2] Under this rule, what is the evidence, and what facts could the jury find from it, giving it a construction most favorable to the plaintiff, which we must do on a motion for nonsuit? The evidence of the plaintiff, if believed, shows that the horse was 25 or 28 steps beyond the crossing, when he began to back; that he was backing towards the track; that he continued to back without stopping until there was a collision between the wagon and the train; that the driver was trying to stop the horse, and could not do so; that the horse and wagon and driver were in full view of the engineer; that the engineer called to the driver, and told him to stop backing into the train, when about 15 or 20 yards from him; that at the time the horse began to back the engine was 75 yards from the crossing, and that it could have been stopped in eight feet. If so, there was evidence that the engineer could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have seen that a collision was imminent in time to stop the engine and avoid the injury. There was evidence on the part of the defendant, which, if accepted by the jury, would exonerate it. The engineer testified that he saw the horse backing, and reduced the speed of his engine; that when near the horse and wagon the horse stopped, and appeared to be under control; that he then increased his speed, and as he was passing the crossing the horse suddenly reared and backed into the train. If the jury should find this evidence to be true, the defendant would not be liable. The case of Kearns v. Railroad, 139 N. C. 471, 52 S. E. 131, is not in conflict with these views. In that case the train had passed the crossing when the horse began to back, and there was no evidence, in the opinion of the court, of anything the engineer could have done to avoid the injury.

[3-5] There is some evidence of negligence on the part of the driver in charge of the horse and wagon at the time of the injury; but it is not of such character that we can declare, as matter of law, that it amounts to contributory negligence. It was his duty to look and listen as he approached the crossing, and ordinarily a failure to do so will bar a recovery for an injury on the crossing; but in this case the crossing was passed in safety, and there is no causal connection between this failure of duty and the injury. If, after the horse began to back, the driver was negligent, and this negligence continued to the time of the injury and contributed to it, the plaintiff could not recover; but in passing upon this question the jury would have the right to consider his surroundings, and the law would require no more of him than to act as a man of ordinary prudence would have done under similar circumstances. The question is, not what a prudent man would do now, in the light of subsequent events, but what would a man of ordinary prudence have done in the situation the driver was placed.

[6] In our opinion, there was some evidence for the consideration of the jury, and a new trial is ordered.

New trial.

LIVERMAN v. CAHOON.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 25*)—JOINT NOTE—DISCHARGE.

Where plaintiff, one of two joint makers of a note, paid it at maturity, the payee indorsing it to plaintiff without recourse, this payment discharged the note, and plaintiff's right to recover against his co-maker was upon the implied promise, and not upon the note, and hence the statute limiting the time for bringing an action against a written instrument does not apply to plaintiff's cause of action, which was barred in three years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 138*)—PROMISE NOT TO PLEAD THE STATUTE.

Where plaintiff, one of two joint makers of a note, paid it at maturity, and the defendant requested him to "hold up the note until he could pay his part," this request was not a promise not to plead limitations, and plaintiff could not excuse his delay to sue upon that ground.

Walker and Brown, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by W. E. Liverman against F. L. W. Cahoon. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. F. Aydlott and T. H. Woodley, for appellant. I. M. Meekins and M. H. Tillitt, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. On June 21, 1904, the plaintiff and the defendant, Cahoon, executed a joint note under seal at 60 days to John W. Sykes for $600, with interest from date. This bond was secured by chattel mortgage on certain logs. It fell due August 21, 1904, and was paid by the plaintiff by a check for $606.90 dated September 27, 1904. This action for contribution was begun October 25, 1910, and the defendant pleaded the statute of limitations. The plaintiff testified that, when the bond fell due, the defendant said he was not prepared to pay it, and asked the plaintiff "to take up the note and hold the same until he could pay his part of it, which would be in a short time; that this was all that was said to him by Cahoon about paying the note"; that he paid the note, and that it was then indorsed by the obligee as follow: "Pay the within note to W. E. Liverman, without recourse on me, 27 Sept. 1904. J. W. Sykes." The judge instructed the jury that, if they believed all the evidence, to answer the issue as to the statute of limitations "Yes." Plaintiff excepted. Verdict and judgment accordingly. Plaintiff appealed.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1, 2] This presents the only point in the case. The chattel mortgage security cuts no figure as the logs were the joint property of the obligors, and have doubtless long since been used. In Sherwood v. Collier, 14 N. C. 381, 24 Am. Dec. 264, Chief Justice Ruffin said: "A payment by any one of two or more jointly or jointly and severally bound for the same debt is payment by all. * * * It is true that, if payment be not intended by the purchaser, there is a difference, but that can only be by a stranger or by using the name of a stranger to whom an assignment can be made when jointly liable. This is upon the score of the intention, and because the plea of payment by a stranger is bad upon demurrer. If the assignment of a joint security be taken to the surety himself, there is an extinguishment, notwithstanding the intention, because an assignment to one of his own debt is an absurdity." This case has been often cited and approved. See Anno. Ed. Here the payment was made by one of the principals, and not even by a surety, and there is no security to be assigned. The evidence makes out simply a payment by one of the joint obligors and a request by the other to hold up the note "until he could pay his part of it, which would be in a short time." This request implies no more than a promise by the defendant to pay his half which the law raised from the fact of payment without any express promise. There was no promise not to plead the statute if delay was given, as is held necessary. Hill v. Hilliard, 103 N. C. 34, 9 S. E. 639. Nor, indeed, was there any promise to delay given by plaintiff. The indorsement of the note to the plaintiff, one of the obligors, by the creditor, in no wise altered the fact that it was a payment, and that the note was canceled thereby. The plaintiff could not hold the note and sue upon his own obligation which he had already paid. He was entitled to recover of the defendant one-half of the sum he had paid. Such action should have been brought within three years. The plaintiff, not having done so, is barred by the statute of limitations, which has been pleaded by the defendant. The instruction of his honor was correct.

No error.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). The bond in this case was executed by Liverman and Cahoon, as joint obligors, on June 21, 1904, and they promised to pay the sum of $600 to John W. Sykes on August 21, 1904. When Liverman gave his check to Sykes, the latter indorsed the note to Liverman without recourse. The plaintiff, W. E. Liverman, testified as follows: "When the note fell due, the said Cahoon came to me, and said that the note was due, and wanted to know if I would not arrange to take it up and pay it; said he was not prepared then to pay it, and asked me to take it up and hold the same until he could pay his part of it, which would be in a short time." This was all that was said to him by Cahoon about paying the note. He, the plaintiff, told J. W. Sykes, after the conversation with Cahoon, he would pay it if he, the said Sykes, would indorse the note to him. Cahoon knew he was going to pay the note and take it up. He got him to take it up and hold it until he could pay his part. All of this was known to Sykes. Witness paid the note by check to Sykes on September 27, 1904, in the sum of $606.90, which covered the face value of the note and interest accrued. The defendant, Cahoon, has not paid any part of the note. The court instructed the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they should answer the issue as to the statute of limitations "Yes," which was done, and plaintiff appealed from the judgment upon the verdict. So that if, in any view of the evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover notwithstanding the plea of the statute, there was error, and the judgment should be reversed. I do not deny that, under the old system of pleading, practice, and procedure, this court held that, in order for a surety or person secondarily or equally and jointly liable with another to pay a debt to recover at law against the principal, cosurety, or co-obligor for the latter's ratable part of any sum paid by him to the creditor in satisfaction of the debt, he must have had the note or evidence of the debt assigned to a third party for his use and benefit, and I am aware that it was said in Sherwood v. Collier, 14 N. C. 381, 24 Am. Dec. 264, that this was put on the ground that a plea of payment by a stranger was bad on demurrer. This is a fiction, pure and simple—a refinement of the ancient law—for the fact remained that the person secondarily or jointly liable paid the whole of the debt to the creditor, and the latter was, therefore, fully paid and satisfied, and assignment to a "dummy" or "man of straw" did not alter the fact. It is almost retrogressive, and certainly not progressive, to apply such a rule at this late day, when even the doctrine as to the unity of husband and wife, which takes from her the right to contract, is about to disappear. Is this not one of the fossilized doctrines of the common law, which is not suited to this age and our present enlightened ideas? I regret to say that ours was among the very few courts in this country or in England that required such an assignment under any circumstances, and those courts elsewhere that did require it gave quite a different reason from that stated by Judge Ruffin for so doing. It was said by them to be necessary because, by paying the debt, the surety or joint obligor did not acquire the legal title to the note, and therefore could not sue upon it at law, and either of two courses was open to him: He might have the note assigned—that is, the legal title—by the payee to a stranger, and then sue at law upon the note; or he could proceed in equity, when, if necessary, that court would require the payee to properly assign the note so as to enable the surety or joint obligor to recover at law, but most of the courts held that a court of equity did not consider an assignment as necessary, and therefore would proceed to administer justice according to the very right of the matter, as in equity the plaintiff could sue upon an equitable title, or, at least, as equity considers that as done which should be done, it would treat the note as assigned without any formal transfer thereof. It was also held that, if it had been necessary to sue in equity upon the legal title and to have a formal assignment for that purpose, or to make the payee a party, the court would compel the payee of the note to permit the use of his name in the suit, or to execute an assignment, with proper indemnity to him against costs. But, whatever the procedure under the system prevailing prior to 1868, it is very certain that in that year, by Constitution and statute, a fundamental change was effected in common-law methods, and all forms and useless fictions were abolished, and a new and more enlightened procedure was installed in its place. Many of the quaint, queer, and impractical notions of ancient times, which were found to be unsuited to our civilization, and which often defeated the right and sustained the wrong, perished with the demise of John Doe and Richard Roe, and the sometimes perplexing fiction of lease, entry, and ouster ceased to complicate the action of ejectment and confound the pleader, so that a good title can now be vindicated by a simple statement and proof of the facts. Those forms and fictions are even now of historical value, as evidences of the growth and development of the law, and as such deserve the greatest respect and reverence, but they no longer have any place in our present and more rational system of jurisprudence, which has simplified all methods of pleading, practice, and procedure. The spirit of reform, which was aroused in the early part of the last century and which brought to the leadership of the movement for a radical change in the technical and artificial system of the law and of special pleading some of the greatest statesmen, publicists, and lawyers of England and this country, has at last wrought such a reversal of those methods of procedure as to do away with the necessity of having both a judge and chancellor to try and decide one case separately and in sections, and a person aggrieved, or one seeking subrogation, may now assert his rights in one action, without regard to forms or fictions, and may recover upon a simple statement of the facts and the merits of his claim (Calvert v. Peebles, 82 N. C. 334), if he is the real party in interest; that is, the party having the beneficial right. Even a court of equity, as formerly constituted, would not send a plaintiff to a court of law to prosecute his case there after giving him the legal title, but would proceed itself to award full relief. The rule is thus stated by the text-writers, and is supported by the authorities: "Equity jurisdiction, having rightfully attached to a controversy, will be made effective for the purpose of complete relief, though it may involve the adjudication of purely legal questions." Fetter on Equity, p. 13 (5); Simmons v. Hendricks, 43 N. C. 84, 55 Am. Dec. 439. Or, as put in the graphic language of Lord Nottingham: "Where this court can determine the matter, it shall not be a handmaid to other courts, nor beget a suit to be ended elsewhere." The rule rests on the principle that equity prevents multiplicity of suits. Jesus College v. Bloom, 3 Atk. 262, 263; Turner v. Pierce, 34 Wis. 658; Eastman v. Savings Bank, 58 N. H. 421; McGean v. Railroad Co., 133 N. Y. 16, 30 N. E. 647. It will give a money judgment, if necessary to full relief. "A court of equity adapts its relief to the exigencies of the case in hand. It may restrain or compel the defendant; it may appoint a receiver or order an accounting; it may decree specific performance, or order the delivery to the plaintiff of specific real or personal property; or it may order a sum of money to be paid to the plaintiff, and give him a personal judgment therefor." Murtha v. Curley, 90 N. Y. 378; Sprinkle v. Wellborn, 140 N. C. 177, 178, 52 S. E. 666, 671, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827. In the case last cited it is said: "The administration of this relief is eminently proper under the reformed procedure, where the rights of parties are settled and determined in one action, the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity having been abolished. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 242." This just and beneficent rule, which formerly prevailed in courts of equity, has now become the fundamental principle of our present system of pleading and procedure, so that one judge and one action are now sufficient for the adjudication of all rights—legal and equitable—cases being decided upon their merits, and not brought to the ordeal and test of vain and useless technicalities, so ancient as to be hoary with the age of centuries, the resultant rule, and the material one, being that a party may now recover upon an equitable title, as our courts administer both legal and equitable rights. Farmer v. Daniel, 82 N. C. 153; Condry v. Cheshire, 88 N. C. 375.

Shall we halt in the march of this progressive reform in pleading and procedure and allow a defendant to escape the payment of an honest and meritorious claim upon a flimsy technicality. But let us see what the law of this case was formerly and is now. I will not consider here the express agreement of Cahoon to pay his share, and to permit the plaintiff, when he paid all, to succeed to the rights of every kind in the note possessed by the creditor at the very time of the payment, but will show by principle and the overwhelming weight of authority that under the righteous doctrine of subrogation Liverman is entitled to recover in this action, and Cahoon cannot take refuge behind the statute of limitations, and escape the payment of his just and equitable share of this debt. Sheldon, in his work on Subrogation, § 1, says that "it is a doctrine primarily of equity jurisprudence, although its principles are now often applied in courts of common law, especially in those states in which equitable remedies are administered through the forms of law. It is a substitution, ordinarily the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor, so that the person in whose favor it is exercised succeeds to the rights of the creditor in relation to the debt. More broadly, it is the substitution of one person in the place of another, whether as a creditor or as the possessor of any other rightful claim. The substitute is put in all respects in the place of the party to whose rights he is subrogated. It has been adopted from the civil law by courts of equity. In this country, under the initial guidance of Chancellor Kent, its principles have been more widely developed, and its doctrines more generally applied, than in England. It is treated as the creature of equity, and is so administered as to secure real and essential justice without regard to form, independently of any contractual relations between the parties to be affected by it. It is broad enough to include every instance in which one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which, in equity and good conscience, should have been discharged by the latter." What more of authority do we need? Bispham says that "the equity of subrogation springs naturally out of the two equities, just considered, of contribution and exoneration, and is, in fact, one of the means by which those equities are enforced. * * *

This equity of subrogation is one eminently calculated to do exact justice between persons who are bound for the performance of the same duty or obligation, and is one, therefore, which is much encouraged and protected." Bispham, Equity, §§ 335, 336.

And, again, in Sheldon on Subrogation, § 2, it is said to be defined "as that process by which another person is put into the place of a creditor, so that the rights and securities of the creditor pass to the person who, by being subrogated to him, enters into his right. It is a legal conception, by force of which an obligation extinguished by a payment made by a third person is treated as still subsisting for the benefit of this third person, who is thus substituted to the rights, remedies, and securities of another. The party who is subrogated is regarded as entitled to the same rights, and, indeed, as constituting one and the same person with the creditor whom he succeeds." This statement of the doctrine closely resembles our case, and fully embraces it within its terms. "Whenever, to protect his own rights, one not a volunteer pays or satisfies a debt for which another is primarily responsible, he is substituted in equity in place of the creditor, and may enforce against the person primarily liable all the securities, benefits, and advantages held by the creditor. Like contribution, subrogation rests on principles of equity and justice, and may be decreed, though no contract or privity of any kind exists between the parties." Fetter on Equity, p. 254, § 170. It applies as between co-obligors, says Sheldon, as well as between principal and surety and between sureties and others secondarily liable, and where a joint maker or surety of a note has paid the debt which ought, in whole or in part, to have been paid by another, he is entitled not only to the rights, but to all the remedies of the creditor by way of subrogation. Sheldon, § 3. "This right of subrogation among parties severally bound as principals has been denied; but the usual rule is that one of several joint debtors will as against his codebtors ordinarily be subrogated to the securities and means of payment of the common creditor whom he has satisfied, so as to enable him to recover from his codebtors, by means thereof, their proportional share of the indebtedness which he has discharged; and this, as in other cases of subrogation, arises rather from natural justice than from contract. Each joint debtor is regarded as the principal debtor for that part of the debt which he ought to pay, and as a surety for his co-debtors as to that part of the debt which ought to be discharged by them." Sheldon, § 169, and many cases cited in the notes. See especially Sterling v. Stewart, 74 Pa. 445, 15 Am. Rep. 559; Moore v. State, 49 Ind. 558; Railroad v. Walker, 45 Ohio St. 577, 16 N. E. 475; Durbin v. Kuney, 19 Or. 71, 23 Pac. 661; Shropshire v. His Creditors, 15 La. Ann. 705; Boyd v. Boyd, 3 Grat. (Va.) 113; Martin v. Baldwin, 7 Ala. 923; Goodall v. Wentworth, 20 Me. 322; Sumner v. Rhodes, 14 Conn. 135; Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 131; Young v. Vough, 23 N. J. Eq. 325. Those cases decide that joint debtors or coprincipals, as between themselves and their creditor, are each liable for the whole debt, but, as between themselves, each is liable only for his proportion thereof, and, as to the rest, each is surety for the others, or, to express it a little differently and more exactly, where several parties execute a joint note for a debt owing by them, each is, as to his own proportion, a principal, and as to the share of each of the other makers a cosurety, a concrete example, they say, being this: Where a note is signed by three persons, each is principal for one-third, and a cosurety for the other two-thirds, and all of the said cases agree that, if any one of the coprincipals performs the whole duty and pays the entire amount, he is at once subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the principal, and is clothed with the same, without impairment or prejudice, and in the sense that he takes the creditor's place as between himself and the principal who is in default, so that he can sue, just as the creditor could have done, if the debt had not been paid, and this is so whether the obligation arose out of contract or by operation of law. Dobyns v. Rawley, 78 Va. 537. The doctrine is so clearly and strongly stated by Chief Justice Brickell in Owen v. McGehee, 61 Ala. 440, that a review of the authorities would not be near complete without the addition of his words: "It is a principle of equity, having its foundation in natural justice, that, when one discharges more than his just portion of a common burden, another who received the benefit ought to refund to him a ratable proportion. The principle applies, not only to the relation of principal and surety, but to that of original co-contractors, and whenever parties stand in a relation in which equality of burthen is equity between them, when one ought not to bear the burthen in case of the others, 'as all are equally bound and are equally released,' says Judge Story, 'it seems but just that in such a case all should contribute in proportion toward a benefit obtained by all upon the maxim, "Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus," and the doctrine has an equal foundation in morals, since no one ought to profit by another's loss when he himself has incurred a like responsibility. Any other rule would put it in the power of the creditor to select his own victim, and upon motives of mere caprice or favoritism to make a common burden a most gross and grievous personal oppression.' 1 Story's Eq. § 493." Some of the above-cited cases also hold that a suit in equity to enforce contribution by way of subrogation is far different from the action of assumpsit at law, founded upon the implied promise of the defaulting coprincipal to refund what has been paid to his use and for his ease and benefit, and that the two actions are governed by different principles, and that, as the one who pays is completely substituted to all the rights and remedies of the creditor, without any assignment, which, if necessary at all, is only required at law, the statute does not bar unless the note itself, which has been paid, is barred, or in those states, which have a statute similar to ours (Revisal 1905, § 399) providing for a special limitation of 10 years as to all actions for relief not otherwise provided for in the statute, that the equitable action is governed by the latter section, and not by the three-year statute relating to express or implied contracts. Chipman v. Webster, and other cases, supra. In Batchellor v. Lawrence, 99 E. C. L. (C. B. N. S.) 543, Justice Byles, who wrote the English treatise on Bills, when commenting upon and construing the mercantile law amendment act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, § 5), which gave the creditor paying a debt the right at law to an assignment of the note to himself or a trustee, and the right "to stand in the place of the creditor and to use all his remedies, and, if need be, his name, upon proper indemnity," in any action or proceeding brought for the purpose of obtaining indemnification from any co-obligor or codebtor, for any advances made by him beyond his share of the liability, said: "It must be remembered that one who is liable jointly with others stands in the position of surety for their proportion of the debt, and, if he pays the whole, is entitled to call upon them for contribution. In all rational systems of law, where a surety pays the debt, he is entitled to the benefit of all securities and remedies which the creditor held. Such is the law of France, where law and equity are blended. * * * In England, prior to the passing of this act, a surety or codebtor, who had been compelled to pay the debt for which he was liable, could not obtain the benefit of any securities held by the creditor without having recourse to a court of equity, and not always then. The section in question, I think, meant to afford the party at least the same remedy at law as he would have had in equity. This it does in two modes: First, by enacting that he shall be entitled to have the securities assigned to him; secondly, by taking away the technical difficulty that before existed to his making the security available at law, viz., that the remedy was taken away by payment. As to the first, it is clear that the provision applies not only to persons who stand in the position of sureties, but also to joint debtors. * * * I think a 'codebtor' who pays the entire debt is a surety in the sense in which that word is used here." But the doctrine for which I contend as having existed in courts of equity before the change in our system and even extended by many illustrious courts to cases at law to avoid circuity of action is most admirably stated by Judge Johnson for the court in Lidderdale v. Robinson, 12 Wheat. 594, 6 L. Ed. 740: "That a surety who discharges the debt of the principal shall in general succeed to the rights of the creditor, as well direct as incidental, is strongly exemplified in those cases in which the surety is permitted to succeed to those rights, even against bail, who are themselves in many respects regarded as sureties. 2 Vern. 603. 11 Vesey, 22. That such would be the effect of an actual assignment made by the creditor to the surety, or to some third person for his benefit, no one can doubt. But in the cases last cited we find the court of equity lending its aid to compel the creditor to assign the cause of action, and thus to make an actual substitution of the sureties, so as to perfect their claim at law. This fully affirms the right to succeed to the legal standing of their principal; and, after establishing that principle, it is going but one step further to consider that as done which the surety has a right to have done in his favor, and thus to sustain the substitution without an actual assignment. And accordingly we find the dictum expressed in Robinson v. Wilson, 2 Madd. Rep. 434, in pretty general terms, 'that a surety who pays off a specialty debt shall be considered as a creditor by specialty of his principal.' If the parties in this cause be considered as claiming under assignment from the holder of the bill, and each as assignee of the claim against his coindorsee, according to the actual state of their respective interests, there can be no doubt of the priority here claimed. This subject has undergone a very serious examination in the courts of the United States, and in cases in which, as in this, satisfaction had been made by the surety without taking an actual assignment of the debt." Is this not conclusive as authority?

The same rule is declared and supported by irresistible logic and unanswerable argument in Tyrrell v. Ward, 102 Ill. 29. Justice Walker, for the court, said: "There is not the slightest question under the evidence in the case that at the time Worthington recovered his judgment the property in controversy was incumbered by legal, valid, and just liens to nearly, if not quite, the sum of $40,000, and it is fully as clear that they were discharged and satisfied by Smith with the money of Bayard advanced for the purpose, and as a part of the loan of $50,500, which Hayes had effected for this very purpose. It is equally certain that it was the intention of Bayard, Smith, and Hayes to pay and discharge these liens, to render the trust deeds to Smith effective, and to make them a prior lien to all others in favor of Bayard. This was their clear and unmistakable purpose. All pretense that it was done for any other purpose is excluded by the testimony. Then what effect did such a payment thus made have on the rights of the parties? Manifestly it subrogated Bayard to all rights of the prior lienholders, precisely as they were held by them. When paid by Smith for Bayard, they were transferred to him, and equity must treat the transaction as an assignment to Bayard as fully so as had a formal assignment been made and indorsed on the papers evidencing these debts and liens. This every consideration of justice and good conscience demands. It would be highly inequitable and unjust to defeat the intention of the parties, and visit so heavy a loss on Bayard, when he advanced the money expressly to remove these prior liens and perfect his own. Justice and authority not only sanction, but demand, that Bayard should be subrogated to all of their rights." In Parsons v. Bridgock, 2 Vernon, 608, cited with approval in Lidderdale v. Robinson, supra, the chancellor thus stated the law: "The principal in a bond being arrested gave bail, and judgment is had against the bail. On a bill by the sureties, who had been sued on the original bond and paid the money, the court decreed the judgment against the bail to be assigned to them, in order to reimburse them what they had paid with interest and costs." And in Cottrell's Case, 23 Pa. 294, it was held that "subrogation, being founded in principles of equity, may be enforced where there is no contract for a transfer of the security." And the court in its opinion states this equitable principle with great force and conciseness: "Subrogation is founded on principles of equity and benevolence, and may be decreed where no contract or privity of any kind exists between the parties. Wherever one not a mere volunteer discharges the debt of another, he is entitled to all the remedies which the creditor possessed against the debtor. Actual payment discharges a judgment or other incumbrance at law, but, where justice requires it, we keep it afoot in equity for the safety of the paying surety. These principles, settled in numerous cases, which will be found collected in 2 Wharton's Digest, 612, are decisive against this appellant." This covers our case in every aspect of it, and shows conclusively that a court of equity in such matters disregards forms and seeks to enforce the rights of the parties according to their substance and real merits, which is but a foreshadowing, many years ago, of the spirit and purpose of our present liberal system of pleading and procedure. The case of Robinson v. Wilson, 2 Maddock's Ch. 569 (approved in Lidderdale's Case), was decided without regard to any statute, but upon a well-recognized doctrine of equity, that a surety who pays off a specialty debt of the principal shall be considered as a specialty creditor of the principal. It was also held in Wright v. Morley, 11 Vesey, Ch. Rep. 42, that the surety or coprincipal who have the same right, as we have seen, may proceed in equity against his codebtor, when he has paid the whole debt, for the payment of his share or part of the liability, without any assignment from the creditor or as if an assignment had been made, and he will have precisely all of the rights and remedies of the creditor that he would have had if the formal assignment had been made. If the specialty is not barred, he is not barred.

I will now refer to two cases, which are much alike, one decided in an English court, Parsons v. Bridgock, which has already been cited, but which is more fully reported in 11 Vesey, Ch. Rep. p. 22, and the other decided by this court (Carter v. Jones, 40 N. C. 196, 49 Am. Dec. 425), which is a very strong instance of the application of this equity. It is said that "the principal had given bail in an action. Judgment was recovered against the bail. Afterwards the surety was called upon and paid, and it was held that he was entitled to an assignment of the judgment against the bail; so that, though the bail were themselves but sureties, as between them and the principal debtor, yet, coming in the room of the principal debtor as to the creditor, it was held that they likewise came into the room of the principal debtor as to the surety. Consequently that decision established that the surety had precisely the same right that the creditor had, and was to stand in his place. The surety had no direct contract or engagement by which the bail were bound to him, but only a claim against them through the medium of the creditor, and was entitled only to all his rights. There are other cases establishing the same principle." In Carter v. Jones, supra, it was held that, where a guarantor had paid the entire debt, "he was fully subrogated in equity to the rights and remedies of the creditor to whom he had paid it as against the debtor and his sureties, and that a court of equity, if not a court of law, would regard the transaction as a sale and assignment of the note to the paying guarantor. This is a strong and irresistible statement of the law in favor of the paying debtor. He is considered as a purchaser of the note, and entitled to sue upon it, for equity, as it is said, disregards forms, and seeks to do justice, according to the very right of the matter. It is suggested in Sherwood v. Collier, 14 N. C. 381, 24 Am. Dec. 264, the sheet anchor of the majority, because Judge Ruffin said it involved an absurdity for the debtor to sue himself, that the debt was paid and he could only sue on the promise, implied from his payment, that he should be reimbursed. But the plaintiff does not sue himself, at least under our present system. He simply sues his debtor, who has failed to comply with his promise to pay his ratable part, the plaintiff having already paid his, and having satisfied the debt as between debtor and creditor, all left due being that which, in equity and good conscience, comes to him by the default of his co-obligor. The obligation of the paying debtor has been satisfied, and there is nothing due save what his defaulting fellow owes to him, and for this he must sue the latter, being under no obligation, as between them, to pay any part of it, but his co-debtor being under the duty in law and equity to pay to his faithful coprincipal that part of the debt he promised to pay. Equity then steps in, and compels the defaulter to do justice without regard to the mere forms of law, or the legal title.

It is not to be denied that courts generally have held at common law and under the statute that a surety or co-obligor, which is the same thing, who pays off a specialty debt, is to be considered in equity at least and in all respects as a specialty creditor of his principal. This was so held in Robinson v. Wilson, 2 Maddock's Ch. 569. There is an implied contract between the principal and the surety or between coprincipals that, if one of them shall pay more than his share, the other shall be entitled to an assignment of the bond or other security, or shall have in law and equity precisely the same remedies as the creditor would have, if the debt had not been paid to him. Robinson v. Wilson, supra; Burrows v. McWhann, 1 Desaus. (S. C.) 409, 1 Am. Dec. 677. In the last-cited case, which is very much in point, the court held that, in order to preserve and protect the right, legal and equitable, of the paying co-obligor, an assignment would be decreed, or the court would proceed as if it had been made, and that the limitation of seven years, as to the implied promise, did not apply, but that in regard to equitable actions, and it was further held that in order to enforce this clear equity, the court would order any payment or satisfaction of the debt entered upon the record to be canceled, and would decree that the obligor, who has paid his part and also the share of his co-obligor, should stand literally in the shoes of the creditor, as to his legal and equitable rights and with the priority and full privilege of a specialty creditor, in every regard, if the debt which he paid was evidenced by an instrument under seal. Drake v. Coltrane, 44 N. C. 300. This was more distinctly and sharply decided in Stokes v. Hodges, 11 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 135, it having been ruled that the paying debtor should be considered as a specialty creditor as to rights and remedies in all respects; and is this not in accordance with a just and perfectly fair consideration of the rights of him who has borne, not only his own share, but the share of others equally liable? In the case of Howell v. Reams, 73 N. C. marg. p. 393, Judge Bynum says: "The cosurety who pays the bond debt for which the other is equally bound shall be deemed a bond creditor in the administration of the estate of the deceased cosurety. The same bond which makes them the bond debtors of the obligee by force of the statute binds them mutually to contribution. In carrying out the beneficial purposes of the statute, there can be no reason why they should not occupy the same relation to each other that they do to the principal, instead of becoming by the same act of payment the bond creditors of the principal and only the simple contract creditors of each other." But, however the law may have been before the adoption of our Code system, it cannot be successfully contended that now there is any reason for adding to or upholding the old and technical rule prevailing in courts of common-law jurisdiction. We have jurisdiction both in law and equity and can decree according to the equitable merits of the case without resorting to two courts. This doctrine is well settled in Dunlop v. James, 174 N. Y. 411, 67 N. E. 60, as follows: "In modern times courts of law have dealt with subrogation as they would with assignments, and, when the right of action to which the plaintiff asks to be subrogated is a legal right of action, a court of law may treat a plaintiff who is entitled in equity to subrogation as an assignee, and allow him to maintain an action of a legal nature upon the right to which he claims to be subrogated." In Bledsoe v. Nixon, 68 N. C. 521 (cited in the opinion of the court), Judge Rodman strongly intimates that the harsh rule by which a surety or co-obligor, who pays off a bond, must bring his action within three years on the implied promise, is confined solely to courts of law, and does not apply to the equitable remedy. This was so held because the right of the obligor who pays the entire debt to recover from his co-obligor, equally bound for the debt, depends at law, without an assignment, upon the implied promise, which, being a matter arising out of contract, is barred in three years, but not so where the obligor elects to sue in equity, for in that case the 10-year statute applies, as the right is not based upon contract, but arises out of equitable principles, and it has been so expressly held in states having statutes like ours. Zuellig v. Hemerlie, 60 Ohio St. 27, 53 N. E. 447, 71 Am. St. Rep. 707; Neal v. Nash, 23 Ohio St. 483. And so it was held in McAden v. Palmer, 140 N. C. 258, 52 S. E. 1034, that section 399 of the Revisal, providing that actions for equitable relief or in cases where the cause of action is equitable in its nature shall be brought within ten years after the cause of action accrues, applies to all actions of an equitable nature, and the very next section of the Code (Revisal, § 400) not only permits, but requires, that all actions shall be brought by the real party in interest, whereby abolishing forever the necessity for suing in the name of a nominal plaintiff to his use.

But the express agreement of the parties in this case is to be considered. Can any one doubt that what they meant was that the plaintiff should pay the whole debt, and rely, not upon the defendant's implied promise to reimburse him, but upon the note itself and the latter's obligation thereunder to pay. In other words, that by the express contract the plaintiff should take the place of the creditor in the note as to the defendant's share of the obligation, and be entitled to all of the creditor's rights and remedies. In a case exactly similar, it was held that the obligor who paid all of the debt was entitled in law and equity to the rights of the creditor in the note to the extent of the defaulting obligor's part, and, with reference to this, the court said: "Whatever may formerly have been held as to the effect of the transaction as above stated, the recent decisions of this court, paying more regard than formerly to the intention of the parties and to the equities of the case, have determined that the payment, or, as it may rather be called, the advance to the creditor by one of two joint obligors of a sum equal to the entire demand, under such an agreement as is above stated, does not extinguish the entire obligation, but may leave it in force as furnishing a remedy for doing justice to the obligor who has made the advance. In other words, one co-obligor is allowed to purchase the remedy of the obligee against the other obligor, and to enforce it at law in the name of the obligee for procuring contribution or full payment, as he may be entitled to the one or the other." Smith v. Latimer, 54 Ky. 75, 79. Is not this case directly in point, and is it not in consonance with justice and right? If it has never received the sanction of the law in this state, and I think it has, is it not quite time that we were accepting it as the true and only just doctrine? I again quote from that case as it so clearly and strongly states the only true principle and with direct application to the facts of this case: "As it is an obvious principle of equity long recognized and enforced as such that the payment of an obligation by one who is a mere surety, whether so originally or made so by subsequent facts, entitles him to subrogation to the rights of the obligee for his own indemnity, though there be no agreement to that effect, we do not see why an express agreement to the same effect, made at the time of payment, and therefore entering into and qualifying that fact, may not be regarded and enforced by a court of law. The case of assignments of choses of action, which, though once considered by courts of law as wholly inoperative against the assignor, have, under the influence of equitable principles, come to be respected and enforced by those courts in actions in the name of the obligee, affords an example, and, by analogy, a precedent for the advances towards equity, made by this court in giving effect to agreements between the holder of a note or bond and one of the obligors, with respect to the consequences of a payment made by him."

We must consider that the obligor or surety who pays the debt has three remedies against his co-obligor: (1) He may sue in assumpsit on the implied promise, or in this case, on the express promise, when three-year inaction will be a bar. (2) He may sue on the speciality when 10 years is the limit. (3) He may sue upon his equitable cause of action, his right being founded solely upon the equity, when 10 years will bar under Revisal, § 399. It is true Judge Ruffin says, in Sherwood v. Collier, the idea that a man can sue himself or receive an assignment of his own debt involves an absurdity, but it does not apply to this case. He is not suing himself, as the cases I have cited clearly show, but is proceeding by action on the speciality, or by the equitable action to recover from the defendant his fair proportion of the joint liability, that which he promised to pay, and which he should be made to pay. It is something this plaintiff does not owe, but which is owing to him by the defendant. We should not be subtle or astute to apply the statute in this case and bar the action, for, if there ever was a just claim, this is one, and we cannot deny the relief the plaintiff seeks, even if we should proceed under the hoary principles of the ancient law, which existed in the days of the "learned Mr. Tidd," when a litigant's success depended more upon the comparative wits of the opposing special pleaders than upon the real merits of the case. It cannot be doubted that the request of the defendant to the plaintiff that the latter pay the money to the creditor and hold the note until he could pay his share and the indorsement without recourse meant but one thing, that the plaintiff should be substituted, not only to all the rights in, but to all the remedies upon, the note which belonged to the creditor—that he should step into his shoes. It was not intended that the note should be satisfied as between the co-obligors, but kept alive for the plaintiff's benefit. Why indorse without recourse, if the note was not to be kept afloat? We must not forget that Sherwood v. Collier was an action at law—"debt upon a bond"—and Judge Ruffin, a great chancellor, was not deciding what would have been the right of the plaintiff in equity.

It may be said that Sykes was not a party to the express agreement, but this makes no difference. Equity will compel him to assign or to become a party for the purpose of protecting the obligor who has paid him, giving him, of course, adequate indemnity against costs. How is he hurt by this course, and, under the former practice, it was quite a usual one. But Sykes did know of the arrangement and assented to it, as the testimony of Liverman shows. It must be taken as true, as the judge charged peremptorily that the claim was barred. In Davison v. Gregory, 132 N. C. 389, 43 S. E. 916, Justice Connor, speaking for the court, observes the distinction we have made, and says that, while at law the paying obligor must have the legal title to the specialty in order to sue, in equity this rule is very different, for there he is considered as having acceded by subrogation to all the rights of every kind that the creditor had before the payment and to all his securities, "without a formal assignment," citing and approving Carter v. Jones, supra, York v. Landis, 65 N. C. 535, Holden v. Strickland, 116 N. C. 185, 21 S. E. 684, to which may be added Wilson v. Bank of Lexington, 72 N. C. 621, and Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 640, 37 Am. Rep. 794, both citing and approving Carter v. Jones, supra. Commenting upon the last-named case in Neely v. Jones, supra, the court says that the headnote is not justified by the decision actually rendered, and, moreover, is not supported by the authorities (and I fully concur in that criticism), but the court further says that this court was right in holding that the surety or co-obligor should in equity, if not at law, be regarded as a purchaser of the note, or so much thereof as was not his just share of the liability, as against the other and defaulting obligor. The case is a valuable one, and decides, after unanswerable reasoning, all that is necessary to support my position. It holds that, if there is an express or implied agreement for an assignment of the specialty to be gathered from the nature of the transaction, it would amount to an equitable assignment, though no formal assignment was ever executed. The creditor in the transaction simply retires and the paying obligor steps into his shoes, fully clothed and panoplied with all his rights, remedies, and powers of every kind and description. He becomes himself the creditor pro tanto of his defaulting co-obligor. This is the modern, if not the ancient, doctrine, backed by an immense weight of authority. Cuyler v. Ensworth, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 32; Orem v. Wrightson, 51 Md. 34, 34 Am. Rep. 286; Lumpkin v. Mills, 4 Ga. 343; Townsend v. Whitney, 75 N. Y. 425; McDaniel v. Lee, 37 Mo. 204; N. B. I. v. Hathaway, 134 Mass. 69, 45 Am. Rep. 289. In Mason v. Pierron, 63 Wis. 239, 23 N. W. 119, it was said: "The courts of this country, however, have very generally adhered to the ancient rule, and hold that, although the lien or obligation be extinguished at law by the payment of the debt, yet, for the benefit of the surety, it continues in equity in full force. The cases which illustrate the above propositions are very numerous in both countries. A great many of them will be found cited in Story's Equity Jurisprudence, in the notes to sections 492, 493, 495, 496, 499, 'a,' 'b,' 'c'; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1418, 1419, and notes." The same statement of the law will be found in Cuyler v. Ensworth, supra: "According to the modern doctrine on this subject, the surety by the mere payment of the debt and without any actual assignment from the creditor is, in equity, subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the creditor for the recovery of his debt against the principal debtor or his property, or against the cosureties or their property, to the extent of what they are equitably bound to contribute." So in N. B. I. v. Hathaway, supra, the court held that the paying obligor "should be allowed to use the creditor's name, or the security the creditor has obtained; to enforce the right which he has against the cosurety by reason of the payment which he has made on his account." And finally, in McDaniel v. Lee, supra, the court said: "It is a well-settled principle in courts of equity that, when they once acquire jurisdiction over the subject-matter, they will retain it until full justice has been done between the parties. When a party is forced to come to them for relief, they will not grant a part of his remedy, and drive him to a court of law for the balance; but they will retain jurisdiction of the cause until full and ample justice has been done." We could cite cases almost without number to the same effect, and, when the question is properly considered, there is no discordant note. The case of Neal v. Nash, 23 Ohio St. 483, expressly holds that where it is understood that the payment shall not operate as a satisfaction, but the note shall be kept alive for the benefit of the paying debtor, or, if necessary, that an assignment shall be made of it, the debtor may sue directly upon the note or in equity, and under a Code like ours, though prescribing six instead of three years, on express or implied contracts, as the limitation, it was held that the six-year statute did not apply, but the ten-year, the action being for equitable relief.

There is no conflict whatever between the views herein expressed and the case of Tripp v. Harris, 154 N. C. 296, 70 S. E. 470. The authorities cited in that case related to actions at law, and in Tripp v. Harris it was simply held that the paying debtor was subrogated to all rights of the creditor in the mortgage or collateral security, which was sufficient for the decision in the case. If there are any expressions in the cases cited which seem to be the other way, they may be accounted for upon the ground that the distinction between the rights of the paying debtor in a court of law and in a court of equity has not been kept in mind, and, besides, they were mere dicta. Every case in which it is said that the law requires a formal assignment to be made was an action at law, and not a suit in equity. The same reason for holding the note to be paid applies equally to the collateral security, for it was given to secure the note, or debt represented by it, and not the new debt, arising out of the implied promise of the surety or co-obligor to reimburse the party, who paid the money for him. The principal debt must be kept on foot, in order to save the security for the benefit of him who paid the money, and he must be subrogated to the same rights and the same debt the original creditor had. It is far better and more logical to hold that an equitable right in the note passes to the paying debtor by virtue of the payment, which the law will make effectual by treating the assignment as having been made, or compelling the creditor to assign to a person designated by the debtor, who paid the money for his use and benefit. Any other doctrine will work great injustice, which the law seeks to avoid. There are two decisions which bear directly and strongly upon the facts of this case: (1) Fleming v. Beaver, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 128, 19 Am. Dec. 629. The headnote states the point, and is as follows: "H. and M. were sureties for P., and M. paid half the debt, and joined H. in confessing a judgment to a creditor of P. for the other half, it being agreed H. should pay this judgment. M., however, was compelled to pay it. Held that, H.'s land being sold by execution, M. had a right to come on the fund in the sheriff's hands in preference to a subsequent judgment creditor of H. Actual payment discharges a judgment at law; but in equity it may still subsist if the justice of the case requires it. An equitable right to such judgment may exist without any actual assignment of it." (2) Furnold v. Bank, 44 Mo. 336, in which the syllabus also contains a clear and full statement of the facts: "Judgment was recovered against a number of cosureties, who subsequently thereto sold sundry lands owned by them, respectively, while the same were subject to the lien of the judgment. The purchaser of one parcel, to prevent its sale under the judgment, paid the amount due thereon, and afterward brought suit in equity, praying that the land disposed of by the cosureties, while subject to the same lien, might be subjected to a ratable proportion of the debt paid by him. Held that, while at law plaintiff's payment of the amount of the judgment operated as an extinguishment of the lien, yet equity, in furtherance of justice, would subrogate plaintiff to the rights of his grantor, and charge the lands bound by the lien in the hands of the other sureties or their grantees who purchased with notice. And the payment of the debt by plaintiff operated in equity as an immediate assignment to him of all the securities held by the judgment creditor. In such case it was the duty of the latter to make the transfer instantanous."

My conclusion is that the judgment should be set aside and a new trial awarded for the error of the judge in his charge, as to the statute of limitations.

LIMITATION OF SCHOOL TAX.

Error from City Court of Abbeville; D. B. Nicholson, Judge.

Action by T. A. McMillan against the City of Abbeville. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Haygood & Cutts, for plaintiff in error.
Hal Lawson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. McMillan sued the city of Abbeville to recover rent of a building owned by him, and which had been rented from him by the board of education of the city and used as a dormitory in connection with the school system. The rent sought to be recovered was for the use of the building during portions of the years 1907 and 1908. The case was tried by the judge, without a jury, on an agreed statement of facts, in which it is admitted that the city had levied and collected for school purposes, during 1907 and 1908, a tax of one-half of 1 per cent. each year on all taxable property, and had turned the fund over to the board of education, which had expended all of said fund for school purposes before the present suit was filed.

Many nice questions of law are presented for decision, but it appears, from the facts stated above and from the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Appling v. City of Abbeville, 72 S. E. 31, that no recovery can be had against the city.

Judgment reversed.

JONES v. NORTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 251*)—FORECLOSURE—RIGHT TO FORECLOSE.

On August 6, 1909, J., as principal, and N., as indorser, gave to a bank 18 promissory notes aggregating $3,500, maturing at the rate of one note on the 6th day of each succeeding month after their execution. J. gave to N. at the time of making the notes to the bank 18 notes for $50 each, which, respectively, matured on the same dates as the notes given to the bank. The notes given by J. to N. were in consideration of the indorsement of the notes to the bank, which indorsement was necessary to enable J. to obtain the loan from the bank for which the notes to it were given. At the time the notes were made, J. executed to N. a mortgage on described personalty. There was a recital in the mortgage that it was given for the purpose of securing N. "from any and all loss and expenses they may incur by reason of such indorsements," as well as to secure the payment of the series of $50 notes given by J. to N. The mortgage contained the stipulation that "it is hereby covenanted and agreed, in further consideration of the premises, that * * * upon default in the payment of any taxes or other assessments, or default in the payment of any debt or obligation which may become a lien upon the said property hereby mortgaged, that from thenceforth it shall and may be lawful for the parties of the second part * * * at their option to declare the whole remaining indebtedness then unpaid to be due and payable at once," giving to the mortgagees the right to sell the mortgaged property and the equity of redemption of the mortgagor therein for the purpose of paying the principal and interest on the debt and the costs of sale, together with attorney's fees and commissions, the surplus, if any, to be paid to the mortgagor. The mortgage also provided that the mortgagees upon such default might take such other legal proceedings as they might deem necessary and proper. Held: (a) Upon the happening of such default, the mortgagees could not, under the statutory proceeding for the foreclosure of chattel mortgages, foreclose the mortgage given them by Jones for the amount of the notes given to the bank and remaining unpaid, which it then held, the bank being no party to the mortgage, and the fact that the mortgagees executed and the trial judge approved a bond given by the mortgagees to the mortgagor to indemnify him against loss as to the notes given to the bank did not change the rule. (b) The mortgagees could, however, foreclose the mortgage, under the statutory proceedings, upon the default of the mortgagor as stated, for the indebtedness represented by so many of the series of $50 notes given by the mortgagor to the mortgagee and remaining unpaid at the time of such default. (c) And the right to the last-mentioned foreclosure was not affected by the facts that no levy had been made to collect the unpaid taxes due by the mortgagor, and that the same were paid after default and prior to the trial, and that judgments against the mortgagor were obtained subsequently to the record of the mortgage, and that no execution had been issued for a city license due by the mortgagor.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Proceedings by J. V. and J. H. Norton to foreclose a mortgage against N. N. Jones. From a judgment of foreclosure, the mortgagors bring error. Reversed.

See, also, 71 S. E. 687.

On August 6, 1909, N. N. Jones, as principal, and J. V. and J. H. Norton, as indorsers, gave to the Citizens' & Southern Bank 18 promissory notes aggregating $3,500, maturing at the rate of one note on the 6th day of each succeeding month after their execution. Jones gave to the Nortons at the time of making the notes to the bank his 18 notes for $50 each, which, respectively, matured on the same dates as the notes given to the bank. The notes given by Jones to the Nortons were in consideration of their indorsements of the notes to the bank, which indorsements were necessary to enable Jones to obtain a loan from the bank for which the notes to it were given. At the time the notes were made, Jones executed to the Nortons a mortgage on his stock of goods and other personalty. There was a recital in the mortgage that it was given for the purpose of securing the Nortons "from any and all loss and expenses they may incur by reason of said indorsements," as well as to secure the payment of the series of $50 notes given by Jones to the Nortons. The mortgage also contained the following clause: "And it is hereby covenanted and agreed, in further consideration of the premises, that * * * upon default in the payment of any taxes or other assessments, or default in the payment of any debt or obligation which may become a lien upon the said property hereby mortgaged, that from thenceforth it shall and may be lawful for the parties of the second part [the Nortons], * * * at their option, to declare the whole remaining indebtedness then unpaid to be due and payable at once, and to grant, bargain, sell, and dispose of said before-mentioned property and all benefit and equity of redemption of said party of the first part, according to the laws of Georgia, paying to the said party of the first part [Jones] the overplus of the purchase money to be obtained therefor after the satisfaction of the principal and interest due on said debt aforesaid, the costs of advertising and sale, and costs of foreclosing, with attorney's fees and commissions to be due on said foreclosure and the collection of said debt." A further provision of the mortgage was that "the parties of the second part * * * shall have the right either to sell said property in the manner hereinbefore stated, or they may take such other legal proceedings hereunder as they may deem necessary and proper in the premises; but whatever proceedings may be taken to collect the debt hereby secured, or to sell the said property, the proceeds of the sale of said property shall be applied as hereinbefore set forth." On February 17, 1910, an affidavit was made by one of the Nortons for the statutory foreclosure of the mortgage. It was stated in the affidavit that Jones, the mortgagor, was indebted to the mortgagees "in the sum of $2,850 principal, with interest as stipulated in said mortgage, and that the amount of said several sums is now due; that the same is due by reason of the following provisions in said mortgage, to wit." Then follows a quotation of the clause in the mortgage making the whole indebtedness due at the option of the mortgagees upon the default of the mortgagor in the payment of any taxes or other assessments, or default in the payment of any debt or obligation which may become a lien upon the mortgaged property. It was averred in the affidavit that the mortgagor had defaulted in the payment of taxes due on the property covered by the mortgage in a given amount for state and county taxes for the year 1909, a city license for a given amount for the year 1910, two judgments against the mortgagor for stated amounts rendered in a justice's court on October 13, 1909, two judgments rendered against him for stated amounts in the same court on December 8, 1909, two judgments against him in stated amounts rendered in the same court on January 12, 1910, and another for a given amount rendered in the same court on February 9, 1910, and that, before the making of the affidavit, the amount sworn to be due the mortgagees had been declared to be due under the terms of the mortgage and demand for its payment made, which was refused. The mortgagor filed an affidavit of illegality upon the grounds, in substance, among others, (a) that none of the notes were due, and no default had been made in the payment of any of them; (b) that the mortgagor still owed to the bank the notes given to it which were not due, and the bank had not declared the entire debt due, and that no part of that indebtedness was owing and due to the mortgagees; (c) that no judgment had been rendered against the mortgagees upon their contract of suretyship; (d) that state and county taxes alleged in the affidavit of foreclosure to have been due have been paid, that no execution had been issued for the license tax or any demand made for its payment, and that the judgments referred to in the affidavit of foreclosure constituted no lien upon the property mortgaged that could in any way defeat the lien of the mortgage; (e) "that the plaintiffs have no right to demand payment of all of the $50 notes, for the reason that it affirmatively appears in and by the mortgage that the defendant by paying the principal to the Citizens' & Southern Bank would be relieved from the payment of the $50.00 notes, and that none of said $50.00 notes are now due;" and (f) that the mortgagor had paid all the notes given to the bank which had matured. An application was made by the mortgagees to the judge of the superior court to sell the property levied on in the mortgage fi. fa. in accordance with the statute providing for the speedy sale of goods under levy and which are expensive to keep. The mortgagor filed objections to the granting of such an order; the grounds of objection being the same as those set out in the affidavit of illegality. By consent of the parties, the judge of the superior court, without the intervention of a jury, tried and passed on all issues made by the affidavit of illegality and objections to the sale. After hearing evidence and argument, he adjudged that the mortgagees were entitled to proceed with the mortgage execution for the sum of $2,850 principal, with interest at 8 per cent. on $2,300 (the sum of the unpaid notes given to the bank) from August 6, 1909, and all costs of foreclosure. The judgment contains the following recital: "Said J. V. Norton and J. H. Norton having tendered a bond to indemnify the said N. N. Jones against any loss by reason of the notes held by the Citizens' & Southern Bank, the said bond is hereby approved and ordered filed as a part of the record." A sale of the property was ordered after 10 days' advertisement. Jones, the mortgagor, excepted to the judgment rendered and the order granted, assigning error therein upon substantially the same grounds as contained in his affidavit of illegality.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Robt. L. Colding and Jas. F. Evans, for plaintiffs in error. Wm. M. Farr and E. S. Elliott, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Some courts have sought to establish a distinction between a contract of a principal to indemnify his surety against damage merely and nothing more and a contract by which a principal undertakes to indemnify his surety against any liability for the failure of the principal to do a certain act or pay a certain sum of money at a stated time, and have held that in instances of the first character damage must be shown before the surety is entitled to recover, but in cases of the latter kind the surety upon the default of his principal has a right of action though he has not been damnified. This distinction, however, has not been recognized by all courts, and, even where it has been adopted, the different courts have not agreed as to the measure of damages the surety is entitled to recover in cases falling within the latter classification. In the view we take of the case now before us, it is unnecessary to commit ourselves as for or against the doctrine above stated. The mortgagees in the present case adopted the statutory proceeding for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage, which is that "any person holding a mortgage on personal property and wishing to foreclose the same, shall, either in person, or by his agent, or attorney in fact or at law, go before some officer of this state who is authorized by law to administer oaths, * * * and make affidavit to the amount of principal and interest due on such mortgage, * * * and when such mortgage, or sworn copy, with such affidavit annexed thereto, shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county wherein the mortgagor resides at the date of the foreclosure, * * * it shall be the duty of the clerk to issue an execution * * * commanding the sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy the principal and interest, together with the cost of the proceedings to foreclose the said mortgage." Civ. Code 1910, § 3286. This section clearly contemplates that the affidavit shall be made as to the amount of principal and interest due to the holder of the mortgage; and it follows, of course, that a chattel mortgage cannot be foreclosed under the statutory proceeding for a debt owing to any one other than the holder of the mortgage. In the case under review there was no covenant that Jones, the mortgagor, should pay to the Nortons, the mortgagees, any of the indebtedness evidenced by the notes which Jones as principal and the Nortons as his sureties had given the bank. Jones owed such indebtedness to the bank, and there was no contingency in the mortgage upon the happening of which he would owe it to the Nortons, except their payment of it to the bank. The mere fact that Jones covenanted in the mortgage that all of the notes remaining unpaid should become due upon his default as to the payment of taxes, etc., did not, upon such default, make him indebted to the Nortons for what he owed the bank, especially as the bank was not a party to such covenant. If Jones, in order to secure the Nortons, had given them a note for the sum of the notes given to the bank, or had entered into a covenant with them to pay such sum, then a different question would be presented. Even in such a case there is a difference of judicial opinion as to whether the mortgagees could recover before judgment had been rendered against them, or they had been damaged. Nor are the courts which hold that the mortgagees in such circumstances may recover unanimous as to the method by which the mortgagor should be protected from the possibility of having subsequently to pay the same debt to the creditor. In the case under consideration, the Nortons tendered, and the trial judge approved, a bond given by the Nortons, the mortgagees, to Jones, the mortgagor, to indemnify Jones against any loss by reason of the notes held by the bank against Jones as principal and the Nortons as sureties; but our statute does not recognize or provide for such a bond. The ordinary rule stated in our Code is: "If the principal executes any mortgage or gives other security to the surety or indorser to indemnify him against loss by reason of his suretyship, the surety or indorser may proceed to foreclose such mortgage, or enforce such other lien or security as soon as judgment shall be rendered against him on his contract." Civ. Code 1910, § 3555. Under this section no foreclosure can be had ordinarily until after judgment against the mortgagee. Importers' & Traders' Bank v. McGhees, 88 Ga. 703, 16 S. E. 27. Our conclusion is that the Nortons did not have the right under the statutory proceedings to foreclose chattel mortgages to foreclose the mortgage held by them for the amount of the notes given by Jones as principal and themselves as sureties, which notes the bank held.

2. The mortgagees, however, did have the right to foreclose the mortgage under the statutory proceedings upon the default of the mortgagor to pay taxes due on the mortgaged property, or failure to discharge the judgments rendered against him, or for the indebtedness represented by so many of the series of $50 notes given by the mortgagor to the mortgagees and remaining unpaid at the time of such default, and which were given by the mortgagor to the mortgagees in consideration of their suretyship on the notes given by the mortgagor to the bank. This series of notes represented an indebtedness of the mortgagor to the mortgagees, the payment of which was secured by the mortgage; and their maturity was accelerated, in accordance with the covenant in the mortgage, upon the default of the mortgagee as above stated. The facts that no levy had been made to collect the unpaid taxes and that the same were paid prior to the trial, and that the judgments against the mortgagor were obtained subsequently to the record of the mortgage, and that no execution had been issued for the city license, were not valid reasons why the mortgage should not be foreclosed for the indebtedness due to the mortgagees under the mortgage and the covenant contained therein. There is no merit in any of the other assignments of error, nor do they require special consideration.

[2] 3. The mortgagor offered an amendment to his affidavit of illegality, which was disallowed by the court. Error is assigned upon this ruling in the bill of exceptions. However, the proffered amendment is not set out therein, nor attached thereto as an exhibit, but is sought to be brought up only as a part of the record. As has been frequently decided, such assignment of error presents no question for review. Williford v. Denby, 127 Ga. 786, 56 S. E. 1010.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment in so far as it authorized the defendants in error to proceed to collect in the foreclosure proceeding the sum of $2,300, the indebtedness represented by the notes given to the bank with interest thereon, must be reversed.

Error from Superior Court, Bulloch County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Application of Linton Neal, administrator, and others, for the probate of a will. W. H. Bowen and others filed a caveat. From an order admitting the will to probate, the caveators bring error. Reversed.

H. B. Strange and Anderson & Speer, for plaintiffs in error. Brannen & Booth, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. This was an application for the probate in solemn form of the will of James M. Bowen. A caveat was filed, and the case was appealed by consent from the court of ordinary to the superior court. Upon the hearing, at the conclusion of the evidence offered by the propounder, counsel for the caveators made a motion to direct a verdict setting aside the will, on the ground that the propounder had failed to make out a prima facie case and to establish the will; and further stated that the caveators would introduce no testimony. The court overruled this motion. Counsel for the propounder then moved the court to direct a verdict for the propounder, which the court did. To both rulings of the court the caveators excepted.

[1] 1. The propounders were not entitled to a verdict setting up the instrument offered as the last will and testament of James M. Bowen. One of the attesting witnesses was dead, and, of course, under the statute, the testimony of any one familiar with his handwriting could properly be adduced to prove the signature of this witness. But the other two attesting witnesses, who were in life and within the jurisdiction of the court, should have been called to prove the will and their signatures thereto. Section 3856 of the Code of 1910 provides: "Probate by the witnesses, or in solemn form, is where, after due notice to all the heirs at law, the will is proven by all the witnesses in existence and within the jurisdiction of the court, or by proof of their signatures and that of the testator, the witnesses being dead, and ordered to record; such probate is conclusive upon all the parties notified, and all the legatees under the will who are represented in the executor." One of the two attesting witnesses who were in life at the time the will was offered for probate was called and examined, but the other was not examined. If the latter had been without the jurisdiction of the court, testimony of one who was familiar with the signature and the handwriting of the absent witness would have been competent to prove the signature, just as in the case of a dead witness. But the living attesting witness who was not examined was not shown to have been beyond the jurisdiction of the court. True, it appears that he was temporarily absent from the state, but his home was in Bryan county, and he was a resident of that county; and, while his presence in court might not have been compelled by subpoena, interrogatories might have been sued out with the will attached thereto, and questions in regard to the execution of the will propounded by commissioners to the attesting witness. This is the proper course to pursue where a witness not residing in the county in which the will is offered for probate will not voluntarily attend the court. Deupree v. Deupree, 45 Ga. 417. The named executor who offers a will for probate in solemn form must not only prove the instrument which it is sought to prove, but also that the testator was of sound and disposing mind and memory. The burden of proof as to these essential facts rests upon the propounder; and, where the attesting witnesses are in life and within the jurisdiction of the court, the propounder can only successfully carry the burden of proof and make out a prima facie case by introducing testimony of all the attesting witnesses in life and within the jurisdiction of the court. They must be introduced by him, even though he knows that their testimony will be unfavorable; and in case their evidence, when introduced, tends to support a caveat to the will rather than support and establish it, their hostility is not necessarily fatal to the will. If their evidence tends to the destruction of the will, other witnesses who know their signatures, in case they deny the fact of their attestation, or other witnesses who can testify as to the testamentary capacity and mental condition of the testator, may be called to show all the essential facts and prerequisites to the valid execution of the will. Gillis v. Gillis, 96 Ga. 15, 23 S. E. 107, 30 L. R. A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121.

[2] 2. An amendment to the caveat was offered and refused by the court. The order refusing to allow the amendment was accepted to, but the question raised by that exception will not be reviewed here, because the amendment which was rejected by the court is not set out in the bill of exceptions or attached thereto as an exhibit. Barnett v. Railway Co., 87 Ga. 766, 13 S. E. 904; Jones v. Norton, 72 S. E. 337.

JACKSON v. EDWARDS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BANKRUPTCY (§ 399*)—EFFECT OF PROCEEDINGS—EXEMPTIONS.

A bankrupt applied to have an exemption to the amount of $300 set apart to him in the court of bankruptcy. Certain articles of personalty were set apart and delivered to him. The difference between their value and $300 was set apart in money as an exemption, in lieu of an equivalent amount of household and kitchen furniture and provisions. The holder of certain promissory notes containing a waiver of homestead and exemption filed a petition in the state court, and a receiver was appointed to apply for and obtain possession of the sum of money so set apart, and it was sought to have such sum applied to the waiver notes, which were for a greater amount. Held:

1. That the setting apart in the court of bankruptcy of a sum of money, in lieu of household and kitchen furniture and provisions, did not make such sum exempt from the operation of the waiver contained in the notes, as being a nonwaivable exemption, under article 9, § 3, par. 1, of the Constitution of 1877.

2. BANKRUPTCY (§ 400*)—EFFECT OF PROCEEDINGS—EXEMPTIONS.

The holder of such waiver notes was not compelled to withhold his claim and make no proof of it in the bankrupt court, on account of the possibility that the bankrupt might apply for an exemption. If he were compelled to elect in advance, and not file any claim in the court of bankruptcy, because of the existence of such waiver in his notes, and the bankrupt should make no such application, he would be left with neither a claim in bankruptcy nor an exemption which he might enforce. He is not compelled in advance to elect between claiming as a creditor, and the possibility that the bankrupt may subsequently claim an exemption, which will be treated as not administered in bankruptcy, and which may be subjected under his waiver.

(a) Proof that the holder of such waiver notes filed in the court of bankruptcy his claim represented by such notes, and "had participated in all the proceedings in said court, was represented by counsel throughout the entire proceedings, had notice of the setting apart of said homestead in specifics and cash, and had interposed no objection thereto," did not destroy the right of the holder of the notes containing the waiver to subject a sum of money set apart as an exemption in bankruptcy.

(b) It did not appear that the holder of such waiver notes received any dividend in the court of bankruptcy, or the amount thereof, or that his claim had been reduced from its original amount. Nor is the effect of such facts, if existing, determined.

Where an equitable proceeding was brought for the partition of land, and some of the defendants appeared and defended, but, after a verdict was directed in favor of the plaintiff, they did not move for a new trial or except, a defendant who made no appearance or defense could not, by bill of exceptions, assign error on and obtain a decision in regard to interlocutory rulings, such as the admission or rejection of evidence, made upon the tender of, or objection to, evidence by the other defendants. BRADEN v. MARTIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*)—ESTABLISHMENT—APPOINTMENT OF PROCESSIONERS.

While the protest filed by the defendant in error to the return of the processioners contained several grounds, only two of them were passed upon by the court below, and the judgment of the court sustaining the protest was based upon those two grounds only: First, "that notice was not served upon protestant ten days before the alleged procession," as required by law; second, upon the ground that the processioners had not been appointed by the ordinary of the county. The truth of both of these grounds was admitted in an agreed statement of facts. Held:

(a) Where the record did not contain a copy of the application for processioning, but the return of the processioners recited that ten days' notice, as required by law, had been given to all of the owners of adjoining lands (naming them), and a person not so named filed a protest to such return, but no evidence was introduced that he was in fact an owner of adjoining land, it was error to sustain the protest on the ground that such protestant had not been notified.

(b) Under the provisions of the act approved December 13, 1871 (Acts 1871-72, p. 225), creating a board of commissioners of roads and revenue for the county of Floyd and other counties, the said board, and not the ordinary of the county, had authority to appoint processioners. (Fish, C. J., and Holden, J., dissent from the ruling made in this headnote.)

Application by G. H. Braden to procession his land. To the return of the processioners, C. W. Martin files his protest. To an order sustaining the protest, Braden excepts. Reversed.

G. H. Braden made application to two of the processioners appointed in and for the 859th district, G. M. Floyd county, by the board of commissioners of roads and revenue, to procession his lands. The two processioners, with the county surveyor, proceeded to mark out the lines of his land, and, upon completion of their work, made their return to the ordinary of the county. Attached to their return was a plat of the lands of Braden, made by the surveyor. It was stated in the return of the processioners that service of the ten days' written notice, as required by law, had been made upon all of the adjoining landowners (naming them). C. W. Martin filed his protest to this return, alleging that he was an adjoining landowner and had not been served with the notice required by law; that the application of Braden was made to only two of the alleged processioners of the district, and not to three, as required by law; that neither of the persons presuming to act as processioners were in fact such, being appointed by the board of commissioners of roads and revenue, and not by the ordinary, as the law requires; that no notice was given to protestant, as required by the statute, and he pointed out certain alleged errors and defects in the return, and that the plat was void because too vague and indefinite to be intelligible. Upon the hearing it was admitted by counsel for Braden that the processioners were appointed by the board of commissioners, and not by the ordinary; and it was further admitted that C. W. Martin, who filed the protest, did not have any written notice of the processioning proceeding, though he was not named as an adjoining landowner in the return of the processioners. No evidence was introduced, but the court, on the showing made by the protest and the admissions of counsel for Braden, passed an order sustaining Martin's objections, and Braden excepted.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO CASE—IGNORING ISSUES.

The plaintiff's suit being for the recovery of damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained in consequence of being ejected from a car of the defendant company at a point other than his destination, and at a place which, according to the allegations of the petition, was unsafe and dangerous, and there being evidence tending to support such allegation, the court erred in giving to the jury a charge which excluded from their consideration the alleged negligence of the defendant in carrying plaintiff beyond the street which he alleged was his intended destination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 236*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

The court charged the jury as follows: "If a witness has been impeached by proof of contradictory statements, the contradictory statements ought to be rejected—that is, the statements delivered by the witness on the stand which are in conflict with any statement heretofore made—you would reject that, and the balance of the testimony of that witness is to receive such credit as you think it is entitled to." The instruction contained in this portion of the charge was confusing; and if it be construed, as it very probably was construed by the jury, as requiring them to find that as between sworn testimony and previous contradictory statements the sworn testimony was false and therefore to be rejected, the rule submitted for the guidance of the jury was not sound.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 531-533; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 315*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—ACTION—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Where the plaintiff in his petition alleged that he was a passenger who had paid his fare, and predicated his right to recover on the violation by the company of the extraordinary care due to passengers, he could not recover if it was shown by the evidence that he was a mere trespasser, and it was not error for the court to give the jury instructions embodying this rule.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 315.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 384*)—EJECTION OF PASSENGER—ACTION—INSTRUCTION.

Where a plaintiff alleges that he was a passenger on a car and was carried beyond the point where he had informed the conductor that he intended to alight, and was then ejected from the car in the dark, and, as he started to leave the place where he was put off, he fell over an embankment of the railway company and was hurt, and where the plaintiff's evidence tended to substantiate these allegations, and the defendant introduced in evidence the petition in a former suit which had been brought by the plaintiff and dismissed, in which it was alleged that he was pushed from the car by the conductor and fell over the embankment, this did not authorize the following charge, which was excepted to: "If you believe from the testimony that the conductor pushed the plaintiff off the car, and that this push of the conductor caused him to fall down the bank against the bank, and that he got hurt, he cannot recover in this case."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 384*)—EJECTION OF PASSENGER—ACTION—INSTRUCTION.

Exception was taken to the following charge: "If you believe that the plaintiff was hurt at substantially the place he says he was hurt, he can recover, but, if he was hurt at substantially another place, substantially a different location from that claimed by him, he cannot recover in this case." The word "claimed," as here used, is ambiguous, as the court may have had reference to the allegations of the petition or simply to the testimony of the plaintiff. Besides, to warrant the charge, there should be evidence tending to show such a substantial difference in location as to make a different transaction, or to substantially vary the law or the defense applicable to the particular place at which the injury occurred from that which would have been applicable to the place alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 384*)—EJECTION OF PASSENGER—ACTION—INSTRUCTION.

Exception is also taken to the following charge of the court: "The plaintiff claims that he was hurt by being ejected from the right-hand side of the car, and that he fell on the right-hand side of the embankment, going towards Marietta, and if you believe from the testimony that his injury did not occur in that way, but that he left the car on the left-hand side of the embankment, and that he fell down the left-hand side of the embankment, and not the right-hand side, he cannot recover in this case." The criticism upon the charge set forth in the preceding headnote is applicable also to the extract from the charge last quoted.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by H. A. Purvis against the Atlanta Northern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff in error brought suit against the Atlanta Northern Railway Company, and alleged that on the night of May 16, 1906, between 11 and 12 o'clock, he boarded one of the defendant's cars in Atlanta; that, when he got on, he paid the conductor a five-cent fare, and told him he wanted to get off at Ponder's avenue; that the conductor "accepted his fare and information as to the stopping place desired, without demur, and the car moved on"; that the conductor failed to stop the car at Ponder's avenue, or to give warning of the approach of the car to said street; that it was dark, and the plaintiff could not observe when the car reached or passed Ponder's avenue; that the conductor then came to plaintiff and demanded another fare, which the plaintiff refused to pay, and the conductor stopped the car, took the plaintiff to the rear platform, and compelled him to get off, against his will and protest; that the place at which he was put off was at a point beyond Howell station; that the night was dark, and there was no light at the place except that which came from the car, and the car immediately proceeded on its way, leaving plaintiff in total darkness; that, when plaintiff undertook to turn around and walk back to the city, at his first step, he fell over an embankment about 15 or 20 feet high, and sustained serious injuries; that the defendant was negligent in not having the car stop at Ponder's avenue, in putting plaintiff off the car at all after carrying him beyond said street, and especially negligent in putting him off in a strange and dangerous place at night, when there was no light, without giving him any notice or warning of the dangerous position in which he was thus placed. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled by the court below, and he excepted.

PHARES v. STOVER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—VALIDITY—MUTUALITY—CONSIDERATION.

The plaintiff in error brought suit against the defendant in error, for damages for the violation of a contract having, among others, substantially the following provisions: The plaintiff has appointed the defendant his exclusive agent or distributor for named states, to sell specified articles. The defendant agrees to make sales of them in these states during five years from the date of the contract, and to perform specified acts in making such sales. The plaintiff grants to the defendant the exclusive right to sell the articles in the states named, at specified prices; and defendant agrees to pay the plaintiff named prices for each of the articles; "all deliveries" of the articles to be made to the defendant, or his order, "f. o. b. cars Lexington, Ky." The defendant agrees to accept and pay for a stated number of the articles each month, and his failure in any month to purchase as many as the specified number gives the plaintiff the option to terminate the contract upon 10 days' notice. All payments for the articles shipped to the defendant shall be made by him to the plaintiff at specified prices within 20 days from the date of shipment. The plaintiff agrees to furnish the defendant as many samples of the articles as he may desire for canvassing, at a specified price, with privilege of returning them under named conditions; and, when thus returned, the plaintiff agrees to substitute new articles for the same purpose. The orders taken by the defendant from purchasers shall be on blanks furnished by the plaintiff, and orders given by the defendant to the plaintiff for shipment of articles for himself, or customers, shall be on blanks furnished by the plaintiff. The defendant shall have the right, in such states, to sell certain other articles at specified prices, on commission, and such sales shall be reported to the plaintiff "and same shall be filled with all reasonable diligence; all of said deliveries to be made f. o. b. cars, Lexington, Ky." The defendant agrees to solicit orders and procure sales of said articles only in the territory named. All orders secured by the plaintiff by mail in the states named shall be credited to the defendant as if he had made same. The contract was signed by both parties.

Held:

The contract was not wanting in mutuality, and there was a consideration to support the promises made therein by each of the parties thereto. Happ Bros. Co. v. Hunter Mfg. Co., 136 Ga. 671, 71 S. E. 1099.

2. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 31*)—REQUISITES.

The contract was not an assignment or transfer of the contract between the plaintiff and another party from whom he expected to secure the articles to be furnished by him to the defendant, though the two contracts were in many respects identical in their provisions.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 78*)—ACTION—PLEADING—PETITION.

The petition was not demurrable because the contract of the plaintiff with the party from whom he expected to secure the articles provided that such party should furnish the articles to the plaintiff for a less period of time than that provided for in the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 308*)—VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 245*)—REMEDIES OF CREDITORS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the deed from the debtor to his wife was void as to the plaintiffs in fi. fa., who were creditors of the grantor when the deed was executed, and that the claimant, who was the grantee of the wife, was not a purchaser for value and without notice of the invalidity of the deed; and the court erred in dismissing the levy at the conclusion of the evidence offered in behalf of the plaintiffs in fi. fa.

Error from Superior Court, Sumter County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Mrs. Nita O. Hinkle filed a claim to land levied on under execution by Jas. Smith & Son. To an order nonsuiting the case and dismissing the levy, the plaintiff in fi. fa. brings error. Reversed.

An execution in favor of the plaintiffs in error against A. B. Hinkle, administrator of J. B. Hinkle, deceased, was levied upon a tract of land, and the defendant in error, Mrs. Nita O. Hinkle, filed a claim thereto. Upon the trial the court granted an order, nonsuiting the case and dismissing the levy, and to this order the plaintiffs in fi. fa. excepted.

The following documentary evidence was introduced: A deed from J. B. Hinkle to his wife, dated December 22, 1892, to "the residence of J. B. Hinkle in Americus," the vacant lot of five acres, more or less, "attached thereto," and several other lots of land in Americus besides the lot on which the office of J. B. and A. B. Hinkle was located, also a tract of land containing 875 acres, more or less, and "also all my personal property consisting of household and kitchen furniture, horses, mules, carriages, buggy, harness, corn, fodder, plantation tools, and in fact all the personal property that I now own; all my book accounts, together with all the rights and privileges thereunto belonging." The deed recited a consideration of $5 and love and affection, and was recorded March 21, 1894. Deed from Mrs. L. E. Hinkle to Mrs. Nita O. Hinkle, dated January 15, 1896, to the real estate conveyed to the former by the deed hereinbefore referred to, and to "all my personal property consisting of household and kitchen furniture, one cow, one horse, carriage, buggy, wagon, harness, and corn; also the office furniture, medical library, and surgical instruments." This deed recited a consideration of $9,000, "$3,000 of which sum is paid by Nita O. Hinkle assuming liens and mortgages now on the property hereinafter described, and $6,000 to her, the said L. E. Hinkle, in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged." The petition in a suit of the plaintiffs in error, filed September 29, 1896, against A. B. Hinkle, as administrator of J. B. Hinkle, on an account against J. B. Hinkle, made in 1891 and in 1892, prior to December 21, 1892. A plea filed by the defendant in that suit, and a verdict and judgment, dated June 5, 1905, in favor of the plaintiff in error for the amount sued for, $309, principal, and $257.72, interest. The execution issued upon the judgment referred to, in favor of the plaintiff in error against A. B. Hinkle, administrator of J. B. Hinkle, deceased, dated June 13, 1905, and the entry of levy thereon, dated December 10, 1907, upon one of the lots of land referred to in the deed above mentioned.

A. B. Hinkle made no return as administrator of J. B. Hinkle. A. B. Hinkle made no return for J. B. Hinkle of any property for taxation in 1893. In 1892 A. B. Hinkle returned for taxation property valued at $575, and J. B. Hinkle returned property of the value of $21,203, and J. B. and A. B. Hinkle returned property of the value of $1,000. Neither Mrs. L. E. Hinkle nor Nita O. Hinkle returned any property for taxation in 1892. In 1893 Mrs. L. E. Hinkle returned for taxation property valued at $15,703, and Mrs. Nita O. Hinkle returned property valued at $440. In 1894 Mrs. L. E. Hinkle returned for taxation property valued at $14,623, and Mrs. Nita Hinkle returned property valued at $300. In 1895 Mrs. L. E. Hinkle returned for taxation property valued at $15,190, and A. B. Hinkle, agent for wife, returned property valued at $440. In 1896 Mrs. Nita Hinkle returned for taxation property valued at $14,485. A. B. Hinkle, as administrator of J. B. Hinkle, gave bond in the sum of $15,000.

The following oral testimony was also introduced: The account involved in the suit hereinbefore referred to was contracted and was due before December 21, 1892. Dr. J. B. Hinkle was the husband of Mrs. L. E. Hinkle and the father of Dr. A. B. Hinkle, the husband of Mrs. Nita O. Hinkle, the claimant. On the night of December 21, 1892, J. B. and A. B. Hinkle were arrested on the charge of having that night murdered Dr. Worsham. They were placed in jail an hour after the homicide of Dr. Worsham, who left a widow surviving him. They were confined in jail "a year or more." They remained in jail from the time of their arrest until the death of Dr. J. B. Hinkle and the trial of Dr. A. B. Hinkle. "From December, 1892, on through 1893, Drs. J. B. and A. B. Hinkle saw their wives almost every day, and they continued seeing their wives until the old doctor died, and Dr. A. B. Hinkle was acquitted. Mrs. L. E. Hinkle is the mother-in-law of Mrs. N. O. Hinkle, and Mrs. N. O. Hinkle is the wife of A. B. Hinkle. The Hinkles lived on Felder street, and they all lived together." One witness testified: "I went into the real estate business in 1895 or '96 and have been familiar with the value of property in the city of Americus from that time to the present. In my opinion, the market value of the property conveyed in the deed from Mrs. L. E. Hinkle to Mrs. Nita O. Hinkle in 1896 was about $12,000."

ALABAMA GREAT SOUTHERN R. CO. v. HUNT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 128*)—GROUNDS OF MOTION. Grounds of a motion for a new trial, alleging that the verdict was contrary to specified portions of the charge of the court, are, in essence, merely complaints that the verdict was contrary to law. Atlanta Ry., etc., Co. v. Walker, 112 Ga. 725, 88 S. E. 107.

2. RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

After careful examination of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, complaining of the admission of evidence, and of the entire record in the case, it does not appear that the judge erred in refusing to exclude the evidence, the admission of which is complained of in those grounds.

3. INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

There were no exceptions to any of the court's instructions to the jury, and there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict.
